Mr. SMITH. I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire at what point, if not at the point immediately preceding the amendment now pending, the additional section proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] could come in? If it could come in as an additional section it seems to me the gentleman had a right to offer it at any time when he could get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has withdrawn his amendment, and the question stands upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH. The question I wished to raise was whether the gentleman's amendment, as an additional section, would not take precedence over the other, if it was germane to the question under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia can hereafter offer his proposition as an additional section. The only question now before the committee is the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WHALEY. Is it in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS, of New York, was not agreed to.

Mr. WHALEY. I now move to amend by adding the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the troops of African descent enlisted under this act shall be organized into companies, battalions, and regiments of their own color, and shall be commanded by white officers.

I desire to say that there is a deep interest not only upon this floor, but a deep interest among all the people North and South upon this subject. The people are desirous of knowing whether we are to put these colored persons into the service and mix and mingle them with the white troops in our regiments or not. I suppose that this deep interest has arisen from the fact that a few days ago, in violation of law, there was a colored gentleman in these galleries clothed in a major's uniform, and with a major's shoulder-straps upon his shoulders. It is an almost daily occurrence that we meet with cases of this kind in this city, and I desire to inquire upon what authority these men are commissioned.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the member from West Virginia know that this colored gentleman had a commission?

Mr. WHALEY. If I am not mistaken, there is an order of the War Department prohibiting any person from wearing shoulder-straps unless he is commissioned.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe he was nothing but a doctor.

Mr. WHALEY. In conclusion, let me say that I am in favor of taking every man if necessary, old and young, white or black, bondman or free-man, capable of bearing arms, for the purpose of putting down this rebellion, because I do not consider this any longer a contest between the North and the South, but between republican and monarchical institutions. There is already an attempt to establish an empire on this continent. I am in favor of taking white and black, bond and free men; but I want to know whether or not these black men are to be commissioned, and whether, when law is established by an act of Congress, as it was last session, it is to be respected or not.

Mr. STEVENS. I am afraid the gentleman from West Virginia is a little too sensitive. I am sorry a man of color should have good clothes, [laughter;] but the Government does not issue commissions to them. They allow black surgeons to attend to black men who have the small-pox, and the colored gentleman to whom he refers was nothing more nor less than an innocent, harmless surgeon.

Mr. WHALEY. I would ask the gentleman if the military law of this country allows any man of any color to wear the insignia of an officer unless he is commissioned?

Mr. STEVENS. He was a surgeon, and nothing else; and he had a right to wear the insignia of a surgeon.

Mr. SMITH. Is not a surgeon an officer holding a commission?

Mr. STEVENS. He was nothing but a surgeon; he kills in another way; that is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "shall be commanded by white officers." I wish to say that I am opposed to the whole amendment; not that I have any particular anxiety upon the matter, but I think it unwise for the Government to say unnecessarily upon this matter what they will or what they will not do. I suppose the policy of the War Office at present is to organize colored men into companies and regiments and brigades as an exclusive class, and officer them by white persons.

I cannot say what this war will develop as to the capacity of the colored people upon this continent. I, for one, am disposed to remove all restraints which exist in reference to this class of people as far and as fast as we can; and I am utterly opposed to instituting any new restraints or infringing upon the statute-book any proposition calculated to degrade or oppress this people. If they show capacity, if they show ability, that capacity and that ability ought to be recognized and will be recognized. It is an imputation on the white people of the country to say that in a fair contest they are not able to maintain, socially, intellectually, and morally, the ascendancy. I am for a free struggle. If these four million black people enter into this contest and make sacrifices for the maintenance of the institutions of the country, they have a right to share in the benefits of those institutions. Public service by men capable of performing it is the right of the people, black and white.

Sir, I am opposed to this amendment. I do not offer any antagonistic proposition; but I say that, so far as I am concerned, the field shall be open to black men as well as to white. If, with the ascendancy which twenty-five million white people have in a struggle with four millions of an oppressed and degraded race, we are not able to maintain the ascendancy, then I say—surrender. I believe we are able to maintain that ascendancy; but whatever positions these people show themselves capable of holding, with honor to themselves and advantage to the country, never shall my vote restrain them from obtaining.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am opposed to the amendment offered on the other side not because I differ with the gentleman in his statement to the committee. I know that the system adopted by the War Department for the management of these colored troops is precisely as he represents it. And I have yet to ascertain that there is any reasonable complaint on that account. These troops are not only officered by white officers, but by officers who have undergone very close examination. The consequence is that they have a good class of officers. I have seen no disposition to depart from that fixed policy of keeping whites to themselves and blacks to themselves, unless it be a matter of taste outside of the Army.

But the reason that I oppose the amendment is that I think it will interfere with what I propose to do; and I will tell the committee what that is. It is not the wish of the Committee on Military Affairs to pass over, section by section, the substitute which it has reported; but with the consent of the committee I shall withdraw that substitute, with a view of having it perfected and offered in the House. It is the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs to embody in that substitute all those amendments that have been passed upon here, and that the committee has indicated a purpose and wish to have incorporated in the bill.

When I have thus offered the substitute in the House I shall ask that the whole bill, with the series of amendments adopted in committee, be printed, and that along with them shall be printed this substitute which I propose to offer to-morrow. We can then adjourn, and have the whole matter before us in print to-morrow.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on Mr. WHALEY's amendment,

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken by division; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases where slaves have been heretofore enlisted in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payments of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as well as to those who may hereafter be recruited.

Mr. Chairman, in the State of Missouri, under the order of the military commander of that department, the enlistment or recruiting of slaves has been going on for the last three or four months, and I suppose that three fourths of the whole number of slaves that will be procured for the Army in that State have already entered the military service. I do not know how far the provisions of this bill as it stands without my amendment are applicable to those slaves that have already enlisted; but in order to make that point clear I have offered this additional section; that all the provisions of the bill, so far as bounty and compensation are concerned, shall apply to those slaves who have already enlisted as well as to those who shall hereafter enlist.

Mr. Chairman, it would be eminently unjust to the loyal slaveholders of Missouri not to give them all the advantages that are conferred by this bill, and the purpose of my amendment is simply to place them upon the same ground with the loyal slaveholders whose slaves shall hereafter be drafted or enlist. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

The amendment was adopted—ayes 52, noes 51.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose now to withdraw the substitute which is pending in committee, and that the committee rise for the purpose of offering another substitute in the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he proposes to allow an opportunity of amending his substitute in the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. That will be for the House to determine. My intention is to ask for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I object to the withdrawal of the substitute in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can give its consent to the withdrawal of the substitute if it is its desire.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose it is competent for us to dispose of it without going through it section by section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is certainly no necessity for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is unnecessary to consider the substitute section by section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that so long as any member desires to offer an amendment the committee cannot rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware that any gentleman desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to offer an amendment, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] was upon the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I submit the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the pay of privates in the regular Army, volunteers, and drafted men in the service of the United States, shall be eighteen dollars per month, for three years from and after the passage of this act, and until otherwise fixed by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order, that the amendment is not germane to the bill. There is nothing in the bill about the pay of soldiers.

Mr. HALE. I offer it as an additional section, and I think it is certainly germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it may be received as an additional section.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand the Chair to decide that this provision is germane to a bill which has nothing in it about the pay of soldiers?

The CHAIR. The Chair upon further consideration thinks it is not germane.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COX. I renew it, fixing the sum at twenty-five dollars a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule the amendment out of order. So far as it relates to drafted men the Chair will not now say that it would not be in order, but in its reference to the volunteers and regular Army it is certainly not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the proposition in this form:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the pay of privates drafted under the provisions of this act shall be twenty dollars per month, for three years from and after the passage of this act, and until otherwise fixed by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the amendment is out of order in the shape in which it is now presented. There is nothing about pay in this bill, and if an amendment of this kind is admissible you might as well fix everything relating to the rations and clothing and all emoluments in this bill. I certainly think the amendment is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair will allow me to state that the original act to which this is an amendment contained a provision relating to the pay of the men, and if it was in order in that bill it certainly is in order in this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. COX. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that point. I am very sorry to do it, but I think the amendment is germane.

The question was taken on sustaining the decision of the Chair, and the vote was announced—ayes 64, noes 49.

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; and the decision of the Chair was therefore sustained.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I make the point of order that it is not in order for the committee to rise and report the bill until every amendment has been received.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Who has any amendment to offer?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I have. I move to add the following:

And be it further enacted, That the President is authorized to offer such bounties to volunteers who may hereafter be required as he shall deem expedient, not exceeding, however, $500 for each, one half of such bounties to be paid in advance, and one half upon the final discharge of the soldier; and that all proceedings under the draft be suspended until it shall have been ascertained by actual experience that a sufficient number of volunteers cannot be procured through the bounties hereby authorized; and that the President, upon being convinced that volunteers cannot so be obtained, may by proclamation resume proceedings under the draft.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House to this fact, that the amendment which is now proposed is unlike any that has been offered to it. It is proposed to persist in the draft, and yet offers to us on this side of the House a chance for larger experiment by means of bounty to reach the object of filling our armies.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the system of draft so long as we can resort to volunteers, upon this ground, that the Government for all other purposes, when it employs men in the navy-yards, when it provides for laborelsewhere, goes into the market and competes with others by paying a higher price. There is no reason why the Government, when it needs the service of soldiers, should force that service more than there is when it needs the service of men to work in its ship-yards, that it should draft them and compel them to work at such prices as the Government chooses to offer.

We all know that the circumstances of the country have changed materially within the last two years, that labor which a few years ago could be had for from fifteen to thirty dollars a month has gone up to $100. I insist, when the Government desires the labor of any man worth now $100 a month, that it should pay that man accordingly. You allow the additional value of labor to enter when you make iron-clad ships. If the Government says that it cannot compete with these prices, why not do then as in the case of the soldier? Why not draft the laborers? Why not, when you want clothing for the Army or Navy, seize upon it and say that we will give so much and so much only? Why, when the Government wants anything else, should it not seize upon it and condemn it at the price it can afford to give?

I insist that the soldier is as much entitled to fair compensation under the present circumstances, under the changes caused by depreciation of our currency, as any other individual. I ask any gentleman whether the Government can go into the market, take whatever it wants, and fix a price upon it? The whole principle is wrong. We should pay the soldier enough to go into the service, enough to induce him to enlist. If you want to carry out the old feudal system, that the Government has the right to call upon the service of those under it, then you reverse our system. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "white" before the word "volunteers." I do not wish to consume the time of the House in discussing this question, but I will say that I understand the conscript act has already provided both for colored conscripts and other acts for negro volunteers. Under the former act there are some States that must furnish to the Army white soldiers whose blood is to be put into the balance as against Africans, or negroes furnished by other States. It seems to me that when you take a white man who can readily become an efficient soldier in the Army of the United States and place him in those States that prohibit by legislative enactment or organic law the immigration of negroes into their borders upon an equality with a negro who may be found in other States not only as a citizen free to emigrate there, but as an elector in such States, you do an act of injustice.

It seems to me further, that when you take a slave, unacquainted with those impulses of freedom, and those aspirations which induce one to take up arms in defense of liberty and free institutions, and place him in a scale against a white man of the Anglo-Saxon or any other race you commit an unjust and humiliating act. I insist, therefore, that so far as this provision in reference to bounty is concerned, it should be limited to white men who have enjoyed and who know the benefits of freedom, and that such men shall not be weighed in the scale against those who have not known and who cannot appreciate the benefits of free institutions. I know that gentlemen on the other side say that the African race have proved themselves chivalrous and gallant, but I say that those who say this intend to deceive the people.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I am opposed to the amendment, and I will say I am sorry he should exclude the Celtic race.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FENTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now propose to modify the substitute offered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and offer it as a substitute for the bill and amendments just reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I propose to keep the floor upon that motion, but will ask the House to agree that all the amendments which have been made by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be printed, and also the substitute offered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COX. We have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the substitute offered at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will that give it priority to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

No objection being made, the amendments and substitute were ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX. When will this matter come up in the House again?

The SPEAKER. In the morning, as unfinished business.

Mr. WASHEBURNE, of Illinois. I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon the House (at fifteen minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to present the petition of Thomas Drummond and others, judges of the district courts of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and New Jersey, representing that the compensation which they receive is wholly inadequate to their support in the present condition of things, and that by recent legislation of Congress large duties have been devolved upon them in addition to those which were formerly performed by district judges, and in consequence of which they ask for an increase of their salaries. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of assistant assessors of internal revenue of the third district of Maryland, praying that their compensation may be increased to five dollars per day; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of the president of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company, praying that an investigation may be made in relation to the condemning of their property by Government agents, and taking the water of the Great Falls of the Potomac for the use of the aqueduct; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 24) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the southern or eastern boundary of said State, and also the bill (S. No. 23) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from the Dalles of Columbia river to a point at or near the mouth of Owyhee river, reported them with amendments.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1) granting a pension to John L. Burns, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior, reported it with amendments.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTES.

Mr. HARDING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a daily mail line, by two or four-horse coaches, from Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, via Boise City, Idaho Territory, to Dalles City, Oregon, and report thereon.

Mr. HARDING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Portland via Chehalis Gap to La Fayette, Yamhill county, Oregon, and report thereon.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the present laws regulating the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States as shall confine the court to the consideration of questions of law alone, except as is provided by the nineteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, passed September 24, 1789; and to report by bill or otherwise.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. RIDDLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of the McClellan report, without accompanying maps or documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen;

A bill (H. R. No. 225) making an appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's; and

A bill (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FOOT. If there is no further morning business, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to call up Senate bill No. 43.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 43) relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings. It directs that from and after its passage the work on the Capitol extension, the new dome, and the Patent Office building shall be under the supervision and control of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who shall give bond in the penalty of $50,000 for the faithful disbursement of all money appropriated for those works, subject to the approval of the President. All appropriations hereafter made for the public buildings and grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington are to be disbursed by the Commissioner, unless it be otherwise provided in the act making the appropriation. The office of the Commissioner is to be under the supervision and control of the President of the United States. The Commissioner is to transmit his estimates annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his annual report to the President. He is to draw all his requisitions upon the Treasury direct. His salary is to be $3,000 per annum, in full for the performance of all his duties. The fourth section of the act of May 2, 1828, conferring certain powers on the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives relative to the Capitol and its police, so modified that the appropriations to pay the Capitol police shall be disbursed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, is continued in force.

Mr. FOOT. I do not propose to occupy any considerable time in debate upon this bill. The bill simply provides that the work on the Capitol extension, the new dome, and the Patent Office building shall hereafter be under the supervision and control of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and that all appropriations hereafter made for the public buildings in the city of Washington, excepting for the enlargement of the Treasury building, which has always been under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be disbursed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, subject, however, if the proposed amendment be adopted, to the appellate and supervisory power of the Secretary of the Interior, as provided by the act of 1849 creating that Department.

From the commencement of these works, I think in the spring of 1851, until their suspension in the spring of 1861, they were placed under the supervision and control of the War Department; and during all this period of time they were placed by the War Department under the general superintendence of an Army officer, a scientific military engineer. The reference of the supervision of these works to the War Department was made, not by act of Congress, but by order of the President of the United States.

In April, 1862, by joint resolution of Congress, introduced in the first instance by myself, reported and recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings, the supervision and control of these works was transferred from the War Department to that of the Interior Department. Upon the immediate resumption of the works, Mr. Walter, who had been the architect on the building from the beginning, was reappointed by the late Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Caleb B. Smith, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings was appointed disbursing agent, and without any compensation aside from his salary of $2,000 a year as Commissioner of Public Buildings. Congress, however, and upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, appropriated $500 as a compensation to him for this extra service. But no general superintendent was appointed, and for the very good reason that at that stage and progress of these works there was no necessity for it. The contracts for the marble, the granite, the iron castings—all the contracts for the principal materials of the building, with the exception of certain lighter articles purchased from year to year in open market—were made, many of them years before, and while these buildings were under the superintendence of the War Department; and most of them were executed in full or in part. The plans and drawings and designs of the building and its various compartments had been made for the most part; and there were also overseers or foremen of the stonework and brickwork, and of the various departments of the Capitol extension.

What possible necessity or occasion could there be for incurring the expense of a general superintendent at this time? What was there for such an officer or agent to do which did not fall within the proper duties of the architect and of the Commissioner of Public Buildings acting at that time as the disbursing agent of the buildings? The architect himself, by virtue of his office, is a general superintendent of the whole work, so far forth, at least, as to see to it that the work is properly and faithfully executed.

I repeat, then, that there was no possible need of a general superintendent in addition to the Commissioner of Public Buildings and the architect, and so thought the late Secretary, Mr. Smith; and none was appointed during his administration of that Department, and none was appointed until the commencement of the present fiscal year, on the 1st of July last, when the present Secretary of the Interior, influenced, no doubt, by an honest and earnest desire and expectation of facilitating the progress of the work and of reducing the expenses of the work, especially in the executive or administrative force employed upon it, discharged the Commissioner of Public Buildings from his office as disbursing agent, and appointed a general superintendent and disbursing agent at a salary of $2,500 a year, and who receives also an additional salary of $500 a year as disbursing agent of the Washington aqueduct.

How far the desire and expectation of the Secretary of the Interior have been realized in this regard, I am unable to say. I have great respect for the Secretary of the Interior; I have confidence in his judgment; I have entire confidence in his integrity; I accord to him an earnest desire and purpose, so far forth as he may be able to do it, to facilitate the progress of this work, and to do it with the greatest possible economy. He may have erred, however; he may have misjudged, as I think he has, in the matter of this appointment of a general superintendent at this time, and yet governed by the most earnest desire and purpose of subserving the public interest.

Nor would I attempt to disparage the character or the conduct or the qualifications of the person selected by him as general superintendent. I place the argument in favor of this bill and of this change upon broader grounds than upon the mere personal consideration of the fitness or the unfitness of the present incumbent for the position of general superintendent. I put it upon the broad ground that there is no occasion for such an office or for such an agency at the present time. I have only to say, and to insist upon it, that at the present advanced stage of these works the appointment of the present incumbent or of any other person as general superintendent was not called for by any considerations of public interest.

The office, or agency, or whatever you please to call it, is virtually a mere sinecure; and what I mean by that is, that there is nothing for such a superintendent to do but what may be done and ought to be done, and which for more than an entire year was done, and equally well done, by the architect and the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and the several overseers or foremen of the several departments of the public works, especially when we consider that all these were under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior himself. If any of these executive employes, any of these overseers or foremen upon the works, or even the architect himself, proved incompetent or unfaithful, it was the duty, as it is the province of the Secretary of the Interior, and of him alone, to remove them. If there are more of them than the public service requires at any time it is the province of the Secretary, and his alone, to reduce the number to the necessities of the public service. Does the Secretary of the Interior require the aid or the advice of a general superintendent in that behalf; or cannot the architect, under whose constant observation these persons are placed, aid and advise him as well?

Mr. President, if the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in conjunction with the architect, and one as eminent as Mr. Walter is acknowledged to be, can do all that is required of this general superintendent, and can do it as well, why shall we incur the additional expense of employing this additional officer? Why shall we pay the salaries of two officers instead of one when the duties of both can as well be performed by one? Is there any reason for it? Is there any real justification for it?

Besides, the unnecessary multiplication of these officers or agents acting in some sort of capacity as general superintendents over and about the same work, their duties and powers not being severally and distinctly defined, is calculated to produce, and in fact it does produce, disagreement, misunderstanding, and embarrassment, and necessarily divides and lessens the responsibilities of each, and causes serious practical inconvenience, not to say positive mischief. This is the inevitable consequence. It is but another illustration of the homely old household proverb, that "too many cooks spoil the broth."

Moreover, the immediate charge and direction of these works, now so near completion, seem to belong most appropriately to the office and to come within the scope of the general duties of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. The title of the office itself indicates the general nature and character of its duties. The supervision of this work pertains to and is part of the very business for which the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings was created. This bill confers no new or peculiar duties upon the Commissioner of Public Buildings outside of his general duties as Commissioner of Public Buildings, and as prescribed by law. It invests him with no new or extraordinary powers. Section eleven of the act of July 21, 1840, United States Laws, volume six, page 815, provides:

"That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to form all the contracts and to disburse all the moneys for materials furnished or labor performed for the public buildings," &c.

And this is the law to-day, unrepealed and without modification, except so far as the acts of the Commissioner of Public Buildings may be controlled by the appellate and supervisory power of the Secretary of the Interior, as provided by the subsequent act of 1849; and it is not proposed by this bill to take away from him that supervisory power.

Another consideration. This office of general superintendent about which we are speaking is one not known to the law. Its powers and duties are not prescribed or defined by any law. Indeed it is not an office in any sense within the technical meaning of that term. It is a mere agency, and a secondary agency at that.

Mr. COLLAMER. What fund is he paid out of, and by what authority?

Mr. FOOT. He is paid by the Secretary of the Interior or by his authority, out of the appropriation for these buildings, just as the architect and other employes are paid. I say it is a mere agency, and a secondary agency at that. The Secretary of the Interior—being unable to give his personal attention to the supervision of this work, for it is practically impossible—selects whom he pleases as his agent to act in his stead, fixes his salary, and prescribes his duties.

Now, I submit, is it not better, is it not safer, will it not be more satisfactory to the public, that the immediate supervision and control of these works, (subject, of course, all the while to the supervisory power of the Secretary of the Interior,) and the disbursement of the large sums of money appropriated for these objects, shall be confided to some person, to some officer of the Government in whose appointment the Senate have a voice, appointed upon nomination of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, in reference to whose fitness and qualifications for this important and responsible trust the Senate may have an opportunity to make investigation and to form its own judgment?

I ask, will not this course be more safe, more satisfactory to the public, than to commit so important and responsible a trust as this to a mere secondary, private appointment, to a mere agent of some Government officer, and about whose fitness and qualifications for so important a position we have no knowledge, no means of knowledge, and have not the opportunity of making inquiry into and of informing ourselves in advance of his appointment? Without further remark I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, as a member of the committee from whom this bill comes I was very reluctant to differ with the chairman, but upon an examination of the question I was compelled so to differ. I was the more reluctant from the fact that when I was appointed upon that committee I felt that my manner of life and habits of study did not very well qualify me for the investigation of the subjects that would properly come before it; but I felt that I was bound to discharge my duty upon the committee as well as I could.

I have looked into this subject somewhat, and I cannot support this bill, and I think that Senators who have listened to the argument of the distinguished Senator from Vermont will be unable to perceive any very strong reason why the bill should be adopted. Does he say that the work is not well enough progressing now? Does he say that this work, as it is now according to law under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior, is not being conducted with economy? Neither of these points is made by the Senator from Vermont in favor of his bill; but it is simply an arbitrary proposition that the control of this important work shall be taken away from the Secretary of the Interior and given to the Commissioner of Public Buildings. When it is proposed to make this change in the control of this work, certainly the Senator presenting the measure should be able to give us some reason for it. There ought to be some existing evil to be corrected by the proposed law before we favor the measure.

I believe that about two years ago the law was enacted which placed this work under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior. It has progressed under his charge from that time until the present; and is it known to the Senate that the Secretary has not well and efficiently done his duty in respect to the charge thus devolved upon him? Has the Senator been able to say in what respect the Secretary of the Interior has failed in the management of this public work? On the contrary, the Senator concedes the ability and the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior, and he also concedes that the work is being well done, rapidly enough done, and done with economy. Then why take it away from the Secretary of the Interior and give it to the Commissioner of Public Buildings? I understand that he assumes that it properly belongs to the Commissioner of Public Buildings. I do not so understand it, sir. For a very great number of years, how far back I am not able now to say, the construction of new buildings in the city of Washington has not been placed under the charge of the Commissioner of Public Buildings; but practice has given a definition to the law creating the office to this effect: that the Commissioner of Public Buildings has the chief control of the public grounds and the management of the buildings already constructed, but that he shall not have the control of the construction of the public buildings in the city of Washington.

What is the next reason given by the Senator? That the Secretary of the Interior has appointed a superintendent, and that that appointment was unnecessary for the reason that we have an architect, Mr. Walter, and that Mr. Walter can well enough, as architect, do all that the superintendent is called upon to do. Why, sir, the duties belonging to an architect and those that properly belong to a superintendent are entirely different. The one is to look over the work as an executive officer, and the other is a professional gentleman looking to the construction of the work with a view to the plan. The Secretary has given us some information upon this subject. In his report, communicated to Congress at the commencement of this session, the Secretary says:

"The duties properly appertaining to the office of Commissioner of the Public Buildings and Grounds have been greatly augmented within the past few years, and sometimes by the imposition upon him of duties not strictly belonging to his office. In justice to him, therefore, as well as to the public service, at the commencement of the present fiscal year I relieved him, to some extent, by the appointment of a general superintendent and special disbursing agent for the Capitol extension, the Patent Office building, and the Washington aqueduct. In making this arrangement a saving to the Government was effected, while I at the same time secured for these important works the services of a professional and practical architect."

With such a report before Congress I cannot conceive that the Senate will agree to take the control of the work from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FOOT. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him, in reference to the paragraph he reads from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, how it is that it works a saving to the Government by relieving Major French from the duty of disbursing agent at $500 a year, and appointing a general superintendent and disbursing agent at $2,500 a year? So far as that item goes, how is it a saving to the Government?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose that I need fortify the general statement of the Secretary of the Interior by particulars. Nor have I such information upon this subject as that I would venture to give an answer with confidence; but my impression is that by the change, taking the work away from the Commissioner of Public Buildings and giving it to this superintendent, persons employed to do comparatively nothing have been dropped from the public service, and a very large saving in that respect has been secured to the Government. But unless the Senator is prepared by the facts to show that the Secretary is wrong in his statement I stand upon that. The Secretary states in his report that by the change in the management of this work a saving has been made to the Government, the work has progressed as well, and economy is secured. Then I ask, with that statement before the Senate, how it is that we propose indirectly to rebuke the Secretary of the Interior by taking the work away from him and giving it into the charge of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in view of the fact that while he had charge of it it cost more than it now costs? I desired to be well informed on this subject, and I asked the present superintendent to give me a statement.

Mr. FOOT. Allow me to ask, does the Senator from Indiana mean to be understood as saying that the Commissioner of Public Buildings has had the superintendence of the work itself, has been anything more than the mere disbursing agent to pay money to the workmen, the watchmen, the laborers, &c.?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Just how far the Commissioner of Public Buildings had control of this work at any time I am not prepared to say, except as I am informed by the Secretary of the Interior, who says as I read:

"The duties properly appertaining to the office of Commissioner of the Public Buildings and Grounds have been greatly augmented within the past few years, and sometimes by the imposition upon him of duties not strictly belonging to his office. In justice to him, therefore, as well as to the public service, at the commencement of the present fiscal year I relieved him to some extent by the appointment of a general superintendent and special disbursing agent for the Capitol extension, the Patent Office building, and the Washington aqueduct."

I take it from this that the Commissioner of Public Buildings had some charge of the construction of this work when the Secretary says that he felt it to be his duty to relieve him because his duties had become too onerous. I called upon the present superintendent to give me a statement in respect to this question, and he replied. In the course of his reply he says:

"Upon the accession of the present general superintendent and disbursing agent, after carefully viewing the manner in which these works were conducted, he submitted a report to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, embodying his views as to the reorganization. It will be seen that the proposition was to reduce the expense and secure efficiency. With the result of this reorganization the Secretary and the general superintendent are abundantly satisfied, as the pay-rolls for the following month show a decrease of expense amounting to about one thousand dollars, while the work performed was far more than during any previous corresponding period."

Then if the work exceeded the work done during any previous month and at a saving of $1,000 under the plan adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, I ask upon what principle of economy and right the Senate will take this work from under the control of the Secretary of the Interior and give it to the Commissioner of Public Buildings?

The Senator has stated that the duties of the two offices of architect and superintendent are inconsistent and clashing, and that it is likely to produce confusion if not injury to the public service. The Secretary has not informed us of this. It seems to me that the duties belonging properly to an architect need not clash at all with the duties of a superintendent. The Secretary did not think they clashed; he does not think so now; and the Senator has not informed us of any facts showing us that the public service has suffered because of any conflict in their jurisdictions.

I have said about all I desire to say on this question. This work was devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior. He found it to be proper to appoint an architect as a superintendent. Is it an objection that a superintendent shall be an architect? Certainly the Senator will not say so. He will admit that the Secretary of the Interior did well in selecting an architect, if he could get him at a reasonable compensation, for superintendent. This superintendent has had charge of the work now since the commencement of the present fiscal year. He and the Secretary both say that by the present organization of the force and by the present management of the business there has been more work done and at a less cost to the Government; and now I want to see if the Senate will, in the face of this report of the Secretary of the Interior, take the work away from him and give it to the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. FOOT. I suppose there will be no objections to the amendments reported by the committee. Do I understand there is any objection to them from the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the amendments.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the amendments will be acted on. I believe the committee were entirely unanimous in regard to them, and they had the assent of the Senator from Indiana. The first amendment excepts the enlargement of the Treasury building from the general supervision of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Although I oppose the measure, I desire to see it made as perfect as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words:

And the office of said Commissioner shall be under the supervision and control of the President of the United States.

Mr. FOOT. That amendment being adopted, it leaves the Commissioner of Public Buildings subject to the appellate supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior, as now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not had my attention called to this bill until this moment. I have not conversed with the Secretary of the Interior or any one else on the subject. It does not occur to me that there is really any necessity for this measure; but if there is a necessity for it, I must call attention to the fact that there seem to be some provisions in the bill not entirely in harmony with our usual policy. I have not known that there has been any complaint in regard to the management of this matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. I have not known that it was supposed it could have been done with any more economy in the hands of any other man. I notice in the bill a provision that "the Commissioner shall transmit his estimates annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his annual report to the President. He shall draw all his requisitions upon the Treasury direct." The Postmaster General cannot do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes the duty of the Chair at this hour to call up the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this bill can be disposed of at once, or in a very short time, I shall not interpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. It cannot pass now.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I object to it. I want to look into it. I want it to go over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I move to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up the deficiency bill, which I should like to have passed to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out from line nine to line forty-nine.

The Secretary commenced to read the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is hardly necessary to read all that; about two pages are to be struck out. I will simply state to the Senate it is a mere change of form. The committee thought it better to strike it out there and put in a new section at the end of the bill specifically authorizing the appointment of clerks and making provision for them. It is a mere change of place, and I suppose there will be no objection to it. At any rate, it cannot be necessary to read over the clause. If anything is read, I think it would be well to read the amendment at the end proposed as an additional section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out the words in brackets, which will not be read unless the reading be desired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line fifty-three to insert:

For supplying a deficiency in the current expenses of

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 39

the branch mint at Denver for the current fiscal year, $18,377 69.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line fifty-nine to line sixty-seven, in the following words:

For compensation of returns clerk, from January 1 to June 30, 1864, $600.

For compensation of the surveyor general of Illinois and Missouri, the office to be hereafter closed, $1,668 48.

For compensation of clerks in the office of the surveyor general of California, $1,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was from line eighty to line eighty-two, to strike out:

For two additional clerks of class four in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, $3,600.

The next amendment was in line ninety-three to strike out "ninety-one" and insert "eighty-three," so as to make the appropriation for the salary of the commissioner to codify the naval laws $3,983 67.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "$9,632" and to insert "$9,062 50," so as to make the appropriation for the salary of the minister at Salvador, from April 16, 1863, to June 30, 1864, at $7,500 per annum, $9,062 50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one hundred and twenty-four the words "furniture and for," and in line one hundred and twenty-seven to insert "and;" so that the clause will read:

For the payment of claims due various parties for furniture and for the alterations in the offices of the Assistant Treasurer and collector of customs at New York, and for constructing burglar-proof vaults, $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines one hundred and sixty-five, one hundred and sixty-six, one hundred and sixty-seven, and one hundred and sixty-eight, as follows:

For deficiency to pay for goods furnished to Peter Boyce, Indian farm agent at Coon creek, Utah Territory, in 1859, $710.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines one hundred and ninety-seven, one hundred and ninety-eight, and one hundred and ninety-nine, as follows:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the support of the light-house establishment, $14,156 65.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and seven to strike out:

For erecting naval hospital at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $25,000.

Mr. HALE. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance what is the reason for striking out this appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The reason is that there seems to be such a determined quarrel in relation to that hospital, where it shall be located and how the money shall be expended, that the committee thought it was much better to leave it out altogether. The Senator will notice that there is a proviso in the original bill, in lines two hundred and twelve and two hundred and thirteen:

"Provided, That neither of said hospitals shall be erected within the present limits of the navy-yards; and the cost of said hospitals and extension of said asylum shall be paid out of the accumulated hospital fund."

That proviso is general in its terms, but so far as it limits the location it really applies to the Portsmouth hospital alone, because the other two are already outside the limits of the navy-yards. But at Portsmouth there is an old building for a hospital which I believe is the oldest in the country, which is within the limits of the navy-yard. This is an appropriation for a new one. That proviso is that it shall be built outside of the navy-yard; and that brings up another question which does not appear on the face of the bill. The navy-yard is in Maine, at Kittery, and the whole of Seavey's island is in Maine; but it is called in the bill the "Portsmouth, New Hampshire, yard."

Some two or three years ago we passed a bill here authorizing or directing the purchase of a certain quantity of land on Seavey's island which adjoins the Kittery navy-yard. That could not be purchased for the reason that the law did not define what land, and other difficulties existed with regard to it, so that no land was purchased.

If we pass this appropriation directing the erection of a hospital and say that it shall be outside the navy-yard, we have no land at present upon which to put it, as I understand, and it involves therefore a long delay until the disputed question with regard to the purchase of the land can be settled; and hence if we design to have any good effect from the appropriation of this money to build a hospital, we must strike out that clause, or we shall not have the hospital building until that question is settled, of which there seems to be a very remote prospect, because there is a difference of opinion between some persons and the Navy Department on that subject.

In regard to the other clause of the proviso, it is still more objectionable. It directs that this money for these hospitals shall be taken out of what is called the hospital fund. That fund is raised by an assessment upon the wages of seamen for their own benefit, to pay their own bills in hospital, and this Government never has in any case attempted to make the seamen, out of their own fund, out of their own wages, build a hospital. This is a new idea, and it would be most unjust and ungenerous to the seamen to attempt to do any such thing. In addition to that, if you appropriate this money to be paid out of the hospital fund it will more than exhaust the fund by some $7,000 or $8,000, and there will be nothing left.

These were the reasons for striking out the proviso. The Committee on Finance thought the best way to settle it was to strike out the appropriation for the hospital also with the proviso, leaving the other matter to stand by itself. Under these circumstances I, for myself, am perfectly willing to make the appropriation for the hospital, but I am not willing to burden it with a provision that will prevent its erection, and still more unwilling am I to take the money out of the funds of the seamen, which would be entirely a new thing, and exhaust the hospital fund.

Mr. HALE. I hope that after the explanation of the honorable Senator from Maine we shall be able to agree on this subject. I have not the slightest objection to that amendment which strikes out the proviso which the Senator says is so exceptionable. Now I want to state the exact merits of this question, because I do not like to have it bluffed off by saying that there is a quarrel or a difficulty, or anything of that sort. The matter is just as plain as anything can be. Some two years ago the Congress of the United States appropriated fourteen thousand and some odd dollars for buying a specific quantity of land upon Seavey's island, adjoining the Kittery or Portsmouth navy-yard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not a specific quantity, I think.

Mr. HALE. It was specific even to the thousandth part of an acre, and the Senator will so find. It was an appropriation for the purchase of so many acres and so many thousandths of an acre. It was delineated on a plan before the House committee and the Senate committee, and the committee of conference finally passed the bill, and passed it as understandingly as anything ever was in the world. Still that law was not executed, and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks sent a communication to the Secretary of the Navy explaining why he had not executed it. As I did not expect this bill to be called up to-day when I came in this morning, and did not know that the chairman of the Finance Committee was going to call it up, I have not that communication with me, but I can state what it was.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks gave several reasons why he did not execute that law. One was that the form of the plot of land which was supposed to be indicated was irregular and inconvenient. Another was that there was a highway laid out through it. Another was that Congress in making the appropriation had been governed by private instead of public considerations. I endeavored to have an explanation of that, but it was at a time when the session was nearly closed, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance had weightier matters on his mind to which he asked the attention of the Senate, and I did not press it, and it went over and went by for that session.

Besides the land being irregular in its formation, and Congress being governed by private instead of public considerations in making the appropriation, the chief of the bureau said that the State of Maine by its Legislature had not consented to cede jurisdiction over it, and for these reasons he recommended that it be left to the further consideration of Congress. It was left to the further consideration of Congress, and at the next session the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives had the subject before them. In the mean time the Legislature of the State of Maine passed an act, which I now hold in my hand, and which by the indulgence of the Senate I will read:

STATE OF MAINE.

In the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three.

An Act ceding jurisdiction over certain lands on Seavey island in the town of Kittery to the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Legislature assembled as follows:

Sec. 1. Jurisdiction is hereby granted and ceded to the United States of America over such portion of Seavey island in the town of Kittery as may be purchased for the purpose of using the same as a part of the navy-yard located in that town; and consent is hereby given to the purchase of the same by the United States: Provided always, That this State shall retain and does retain concurrent jurisdiction with the United States in and over all lands hereby ceded, so far as that all civil and all criminal processes issuing under the authority of this State may be executed in said lands, and in any buildings thereon, or to be erected thereon, in the same way and manner as if jurisdiction had not been granted as aforesaid: And provided, That the exclusive jurisdiction shall revert to, and revert in, the State of Maine whenever the said lands, so ceded, shall cease to be used by the United States for the purpose hereinafore declared.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect from and after the purchase of any portion of said Seavey island by the United States; the evidence of such purchase being duly recorded in the registry of deeds for the county of York.

This act was signed and approved by the Governor on the 10th of January, 1863.

When this subject was before the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives this act was submitted to the committee. The committee decided to make no alteration in the law, and it thus had a revision. Knowing that I took some interest in this matter, the committee were kind enough to send to me at the time it was before them and ask my views upon it, and what I wanted in regard to it. I sent word to them that I was obliged to them for their courtesy; but the only thing on earth that I wanted was to let the law stand as it was; because the main obstacle, as stated in the report of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, was the cession of this jurisdiction on the part of the State of Maine.

Well, sir, it so remained. Some time after this act was passed, knowing something of this matter, I addressed a respectful letter to the Secretary of the Navy asking him if this law had been executed or if it was his intention to execute it, and he sent me back this remarkable answer: that Commodore Smith—I believe he is now Admiral Smith—to whom the question appropriately belonged, did not think it was expedient to execute the law. That letter I have. Here is a law of Congress passed with a full and perfect understanding; upon the suggestion of this Rear Admiral Smith it was postponed a year and submitted to Congress; Congress reaffirmed the action they had had heretofore; and after all this the Secretary of the Navy says that on a reference of the matter to Admiral Smith to whom the question properly belonged, he deemed it inexpedient to execute the law. In other words, you may pass an act of Congress, but it appropriately belongs to Admiral Smith to say whether the act shall be executed or not.

So the question remains. That law is not executed. That law will not be executed. It stands upon the statute-book. It is as clear of any obstruction, of any controversy, or of any quarrel as it is possible for an act to be. It is as plain as language can make it. Sir, your sick seamen who are crowded in great numbers in a very small yard, which is crowded and covered all over with buildings, and a vast number of workmen in want of a hospital, are postponed and denied the humane offices which could be ministered to them through such an establishment because Admiral Smith does not think it expedient to execute the law.

If that is the way we are to be treated I do not know that it is of any use to appropriate $25,000 for the erection of this hospital; for it properly belongs to Admiral Smith to say whether such an appropriation shall be executed or not, just as much as it does in the other case. I think the necessities of the service require the erection of this hospital at Portsmouth. I think there is a greater demand for it there than there is at Washington, though I think there ought to be one at both places. I have no desire to limit it; and if the honorable Senator from Maine will turn to the law creating this hospital fund I think he will find—I have not the act before me, as I did not know this subject was coming up to-day—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is made up from a deduction of twenty cents a month from the pay of seamen.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; but I think there is an express provision in the law (though I will not be positive, because I have not seen it lately) that sites for hospitals shall be paid for out of that fund.

But I am indifferent about that. I do think, however, that this amendment striking out this appropriation ought not to prevail, because I think the necessities of the service absolutely require a hospital there. And let me tell the honorable Senator from Maine that this obstinate and persevering attempt to force this hospital on to the navy-yard is an anomaly in naval history. The yard is small. The number of workmen there is immense. It is one of the best yards for constructing and repairing vessels that there is in the whole country. It is the best harbor by far that there is in the country. The best work is done there, and at the cheapest price. There are something like three thousand workmen there. The whole yard, I believe, consists of only about sixty acres, and I think half or two thirds of it is covered with buildings. To put a hospital where they would be liable to have small-pox and fever patients right in the midst of a population of three thousand, crowded together in a space of sixty-three acres, more than half of which is covered with buildings, it seems to me would be an absurdity that ought not to be tolerated. Every other naval hospital we have in the country is out of the navy-yard and a considerable distance from it.

I hope, then, that the amendment to strike out this appropriation of $25,000 will not prevail, but that it will be left just exactly on the same footing as the naval hospital at Washington is left. Let us appropriate $25,000 for it, and let the question of the site be settled hereafter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand exactly what the Senator intends. Do I understand him to say that he shall make no objection to striking out the proviso?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And he has no objection, I suppose, to altering the phraseology with regard to the place. It now reads "at Portsmouth, New Hampshire." He would not have this hospital built at Portsmouth.

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I have not the slightest objection in the world to that change. It is within the territorial limits of Maine, but it does a good deal of its business in New Hampshire, and it is sometimes called the Portsmouth and sometimes the Kittery navy-yard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection at all then to the appropriation of the $25,000. In fact I am in favor of it, and I think the committee would be in favor of it. But I have stated the difficulty, I shall not go into this matter, as the speech of the Senator seems to be a personal explanation on his part. All I have to say is, that he has stated but one of the objections made by Admiral Smith. I looked into the matter myself, and I thought then, and still think, that his objections to executing the law were conclusive.

Mr. HALE. I stated three.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One of his objections was in reference to the shape of the land. But as that matter does not come up now, and as the question is settled, or at any rate does not arise on this bill, I will not detain the Senate by attempting to answer the statements of the Senator, inasmuch as he yields the point I desire with reference to striking out the proviso.

I will move an amendment to this amendment before we act upon it. The clause now reads:

For erecting naval hospital at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $25,000.

I move to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and to insert "Kittery, Maine."

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to add after the word "Kittery" the words "navy-yard."

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be agreed to. I hope the Senate will not embarrass the amendment with a proviso that this hospital shall be built in the yard. I think it had better be left without any direction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On investigation of the subject I am of the same opinion with reference to it as the Senator from Iowa; but I suggest to him whether if we say "at Kittery, Maine," it does not leave it to the discretion of the head of the Department to build it within the limits of the yard which is in Kittery if he sees fit and can find no other place as suitable. Is not the object accomplished in that way? I do not see that it makes any difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on the amendment to strike out the words "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery navy-yard, Maine."

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; that is not the amendment. It was to insert "Kittery, Maine." The motion of the Senator from Iowa is not in order, as it is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, I will vary my motion, so that the opinion of the Senate can be taken upon it, and if that fails the other proposition can be offered. I move to strike out the words "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery navy-yard," simply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, then, is the question before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I think the Kittery navy-yard is the smallest yard in the United States except one, and that is the Philadelphia navy-yard, if I am not mistaken. The Senator from Iowa made a speech a year or two ago in which he gave the area of all these yards. My impression is that the Philadelphia navy-yard is the smallest, and the Portsmouth navy-yard is the next smallest. I think the area of the yard is only about sixty acres, and of that nearly half of it is covered with buildings. I speak that only from general impression, not recollection. I think it would be unjust and invalid to compel the Government to build the hospital within the limits of that yard. They are not required to build these hospitals within the limits of any other yard in the United States, but they are always removed to some suitable distance. I think the naval hospital in Massachusetts is miles from the navy-yard. It certainly is in Philadelphia. If you compel them to build this hospital within this yard you incur the danger, you endanger the life of everybody who works there, and you affix an addition to the yard that is not affixed to any other yard in the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. The yard at Kittery has sixty acres as the Senator has told us, and that at Philadelphia has only between thirteen and fifteen acres. The purpose I have in offering this amendment is this: I do not suppose there is any necessity for the Government purchasing any more land. If I am correctly informed it is not the opinion of the chief of the Medical Bureau of the Navy that they should purchase more land. The Senator from New Hampshire can state whether that is so or not. I have not talked with him for a year or two about it, but I think the chief of the Medical Bureau, who is supposed to be better informed about a matter of this kind than anybody else, was in favor of building the hospital in one corner of the yard. And there are very many sanitary reasons that may be assigned in favor of that proposition which it is not necessary for me to detail here. There never would have been any trouble about having a hospital there if it had not been for personal conflicts that have grown up between gentlemen who felt a particular interest in this yard. There never has been any indisposition on the part of the Secretary of the Navy, or of Admiral Smith, or of the chief of the Medical Bureau, to build a hospital at Kittery navy-yard; but they did not think Congress ought to compel them to build it at a particular spot, in the first place, and, in the second place, they do not understand the specific directions given by Congress as the Senator from New Hampshire understood them. They did not like the location in the first place. Admiral Smith stated, in a communication which he made to the Senate, the reasons why he thought the public interest would not be subserved by adopting the proposition embraced in the law, which was placed there, I believe, at the instance of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. No; it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I understand him to say that there is no disposition on the part of the Navy Department to build this hospital within the limits of the navy-yard?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; I did not say that. I said there was no indisposition on the part of the Navy Department to build a hospital at Portsmouth. They have been anxious to do it; and I think at every session since I have been in Congress, certainly every session since this war began, the chief of the Bureau of Surgery and Medicine, Dr. Whelan, has recommended that it should be done. He has in each of his reports called the attention of Congress to the necessity of building a hospital at this particular place; but I think Dr. Whelan is not in favor, although he does not say anything in his report in regard to it, of going outside of the yard to build it. I am inclined to think, from the best recollection I have of the conversation I had with him, he thinks there is ground enough in the yard and at present owned by the Government, and that the expenditure of so much money as would be required to purchase the new land would be unnecessary.

But that is a matter for the discretion of Congress, whether it shall be within the yard or not. I only repeat what the Senator from New Hampshire has already said, that we have sixty acres of land in this yard. But instead of one third of it being covered with houses, I suppose there are not five acres of it covered with houses; ship-houses, the houses of the commandants, &c., certainly not to exceed six or seven acres. I suppose gentlemen have been in the Philadelphia navy-yard, and there in the whole limits of that yard we have but fifteen acres, and we have commandants' houses, ship-houses, and everything else that they have at the Portsmouth navy-yard; and yet, although it is somewhat crowded, there is quite as much business done there, and done, I suspect, with as much facility, as there is in the yard at Kittery.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have had more discussions about this hospital at Kittery navy-yard, I think, than is necessary to elucidate the subject. It always struck me so. For three years, I think, this same controversy has been in the Senate nearly every year about the Kittery navy-yard, and the land outside of it. Now, it is the desire of Congress to appropriate a sum of money to build a hospital adjacent to or within the navy-yard there. As the House sent us the bill, they appropriated $25,000 for a navy-yard at Portsmouth, but expressly required it to be built outside of the navy-yard. Now, the Senator from Iowa wants us to appropriate $25,000 for that purpose, upon the express condition that they shall build it within the navy-yard. It seems to me the proper way would be to appropriate $25,000 to build this hospital, and let the executive officers build it wherever they choose. If I was an executive officer called upon to disburse this money I should not, without very good reasons, build it within the navy-yard on account of the danger arising from contagious diseases. There are many reasons why it should be built beyond the navy-yard. But I am perfectly willing to leave that question to the executive officers. It seems to me, therefore, we had better either strike out the appropriation entirely with all the conditions, or else insert simply a proposition to build the hospital at any place at Kittery, Maine, if that is a sufficient description; and I would not require it to be built within or without the navy-yard.

Mr. CLARK. I have not entered at all into this controversy that has been going on in regard to a piece of land adjacent to the navy-yard at Kittery; but it seems to me that the course suggested by the Senator from Ohio is the true course for the Senate to pursue; and that is to leave it to the Department to select the place for this hospital, either within the navy-yard or without the yard. There may be room in the yard, for it is a little rising sixty acres—I think sixty-three or sixty-four acres—where this hospital may be crowded in; but the yard is occupied for the various uses of the Government and the residences for the officers of the Government, and it has for a long time been desirable to have an addition to that yard. If it is desirable, then, to have an addition to the yard itself for the storage of coal and various other purposes, why should we take up a portion of the yard, which is already too small, in order to put a hospital upon it if the authorities deem it best to build that hospital without the yard? There are abundance of places all about that harbor where a hospital could be erected. Within the past year a ship infected with disease entered that harbor and was obliged to lay to down in the lower harbor. She could not come up to the navy-yard on account of the danger of communicating that disease to the people about the yard.

Mr. GRIMES. Would she come up if a hospital were there?

Mr. CLARK. She probably would not come up if there was a hospital there. I think a vessel infected as she was should lie at quarantine, or send her inmates to pest-houses.

But if it is desired there is an abundance of room about that harbor to erect a hospital where it will be convenient to ships, and where persons can be put in the hospital, or where they can be removed from the ship without danger of communicating disease to the people in the yard. I do not see why, if left to the authorities, they will not select a proper place. I do not see why the Senator from Iowa should wish to confine the Department to the yard itself, if the Department think it best to erect it outside of the yard. I am entirely willing to leave it to the authorities to select any place in that vicinity. I am willing to confine them to the town of Kittery; I do not want to bring it over to Portsmouth; and within the town of Kittery there is an abundance of room from which to select a site. If they think it best to go into the yard I am entirely content. If they think it best to have it on an island in the harbor I am entirely content. I only desire that the public service shall be subserved in this matter.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to say in answer to the Senator from Iowa, who says that if it had not been for my interference this hospital would have been built two or three years ago—

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say so.

Mr. HALE. You said so substantially.

Mr. GRIMES. The gentleman may apply it to himself, if he chooses; but I did not say so.

Mr. HALE. What did you say?

Mr. GRIMES. I said that if it had not been for the parties who manifested a particular interest in this subject, it would have been built three years ago, and I think so yet.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, I knew nothing about it. This law as it stood was proposed in the House of Representatives and passed by the House of Representatives, and I did not know it was passed until it came here in a printed bill. I never had a word with any human being about it. It came here and was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. We had a discussion about it and the law was passed; and all under heaven that I ever asked the Secretary or anybody else to do was to execute the law, and that the Department refused to do, obstinately refused to do, in my judgment perversely refused to do.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I felt some little interest in this discussion simply with a view of ascertaining what the right of the matter is. It strikes me it is a very peculiar controversy. I understand that Congress has made an appropriation to purchase a piece of land to use as a part of the navy-yard. I understand, for some reason or other, that law has not been executed; the land has not been purchased. Then there came before the Committee on Finance the other day this bill making an appropriation to build a hospital at this place, and there was a proviso in that appropriation which prohibited the erection of the hospital within the limits of the navy-yard. There seems to be on the part of some Senators a very serious objection to that prohibition; and yet it seems to be conceded that that clause prohibits nothing but what has been observed in reference to every other navy-yard in the country. It seems to be admitted that there is no other navy-yard within the limits of which a hospital is placed.

I thought it curious that there should be a controversy about a clause in the bill which prohibits the doing of that which has not been done anywhere else. Accompanying that fact with the fact that the law which appropriated money for the purchase of lands adjacent to the navy-yard has not been executed, I confess I got the impression that somebody connected with the Navy Department wanted to get an unrestricted appropriation for the purpose of building a hospital, and to hold that over the owners of the adjacent land in terrorem with a view of compelling a purchase at their own terms. It seemed to me manifestly improper that such a hospital should be placed within the limits of a navy-yard; for if persons are confined within it with contagious diseases it would endanger the workmen. If they are confined from any diseases whatever the noise necessarily experienced where work of that kind is going on must be injurious to the sick; and therefore I thought the prohibition was a proper one.

But whether proper or not, inasmuch as the Department has observed that very thing in reference to all other navy-yards, as it is conceded, I cannot see why there should be any strenuous objection to putting this prohibition here. It effects nothing; it is only just such prudence as that which they, without the dictation of Congress, have observed with reference to every other hospital. But the Senator from New Hampshire, who is the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and who knows the locality, and who knows more about the matter than I do, seems to be entirely willing that this prohibition shall be stricken out, and if so, of course I shall not make any objection.

I state these views simply for the purpose of explaining the difficulty I had in getting at the right of the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators in favor of the proposed amendment will say "ay."

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what the amendment is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery navy-yard, Maine."

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending amendment. It has been modified by the Senator from Maine so as to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery navy-yard."

Mr. GRIMES. If it will be more satisfactory I will suggest that we amend it so as to read "for erecting naval hospital for the Kittery navy-yard, Maine," and then they can put it where they have a mind to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that modification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator so modifies his amendment, and it will be so put, to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and to insert the words "for the Kittery navy-yard, Maine."

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what may be the object of the honorable Senator from Maine, but I think they will be sure to put it in the yard under that amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest, if the Senator will pardon me, that if we leave it now as it was originally moved it will be expressive of what I think the Senate desire, "for erecting a naval hospital at Kittery, Maine." The yard is in Kittery, and that seems to me to be all the limitation we ought to put upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. CLARK. How does that modification read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified is to strike out the words "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "for the Kittery navy-yard, Maine."

Mr. CLARK. That, I hope, will not be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can the proposition be divided?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, sir. By the rules of the Senate a motion to strike out and insert cannot be divided.

Mr. GRIMES. I am willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. Then I presume we can all agree upon that. I suppose the Senator from Maine has no objection to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. None at all.

Mr. CLARK. Then I propose to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery, Maine;" so that it will read:

For erecting naval hospital at Kittery, Maine, $25,000.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree to it with the understanding that the Department has unlimited power to go within or without the navy-yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to strike out "Portsmouth, New Hampshire," and insert "Kittery, Maine."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on striking out the whole clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 9, line two hundred and twelve, after the appropriation for a naval hospital at Washington City, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That neither of said hospitals shall be erected within the present limits of the navy-yards; and the cost of said hospitals and extension of said asylum shall be paid out of the accumulated hospital fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 10, after line two hundred and sixteen, to strike out the following clause:

For furniture, stoves, carpets, cases for records and papers, fuel, stationery, and contingent expenses, in the office of register of deeds for the District of Columbia, $959.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 10, after line two hundred and twenty, to strike out the following clause:

To supply deficiency in the appropriation for purchase of tenth and eleventh volumes Statutes at Large, $2,765.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire why that is proposed to be stricken out. I believe we have those books on our tables here, and if so they ought to be paid for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state the reason. Congress in 1855 inserted an item in the appropriation bill appropriating $7,000 for the purchase of two thousand volumes of the tenth volume of the Statutes at Large under the direction of the Secretary of State. There was a contract for the purchase of one thousand volumes; but under that appropriation they purchased all they wanted, which was one thousand six hundred and five volumes. The same thing took place again in 1858 or 1859 with regard to the eleventh volume, and they then purchased one thousand six hundred and five volumes, and they were distributed according to law.

A few days after Mr. Usher came into office as Secretary of the Interior a clerk came to him and told him that those appropriations had not been expended; that there were two thousand volumes authorized to be purchased and only one thousand six hundred and five had been purchased, and it was advisable, as the books were on hand, to take the balance. They had, mind you, at the time this conversation took place, only twenty-two sets. Mr. Usher was ignorant with regard to the subject, and he gave the order for the purchase, thinking they were provided for by law, whereupon nearly eight hundred volumes, three hundred and ninety-five volumes of each of these odd volumes, were ordered and sent on by Little & Brown to the Department. When they came there Mr. Usher applied for money to pay the bill, but found that all the appropriations had gone into the surplus fund of the Treasury and there was nothing to pay with. When Congress met he sent a communication here, which he did not write but which was written probably by the same clerk, saying that this had been done, but he found no money with which to pay it, and these books had been received and distributed according to law and the exigencies of the public service.

Before passing upon the appropriation, however, in the Committee on Finance, I thought I would inquire into it. I could not see what use was to be made of three hundred and ninety-five odd volumes of the tenth and eleventh volumes of the Statutes at Large. I went up there and found the facts to be as I have stated them; but instead of the books being distributed they were all there at the Interior Department. When the clerk was called upon in reference to it he said we should authorize the purchase of all that was necessary to make up the sets; that is, the other nine volumes, and about four hundred of each. It was a simple trick of the clerk with Little & Brown, as I understand it, to get the Department to purchase these odd volumes. They were sent there and were not wanted, and could not be used. Mr. Usher, on examining the matter, was very glad to have it explained in the Senate, have the books sent back, and not pay the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Can the Senator tell us whether that clerk is now retained in that office?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know. I trust he is not. But that is the explanation I had of this appropriation; and I am informed—and we may as well talk out about these things, because the Government ought to understand them—that Mr. Usher ascertained that this clerk had received a very handsome present of a full set of the English classics from Little & Brown for his kindness in looking after the books.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 11 to strike out section two, in the following words:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the remainder or unexpended balance of $21,207 56, for engraving, electrotyping, and lithographing, be, and the same is hereby, transferred to the miscellaneous item of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance thought it best to strike that out and have a specific appropriation made. On an explanation received from the Clerk of the House of Representatives I am satisfied that it is just as well to transfer it. They want the money. It enables them to close up an old account, and I therefore recommend that the Senate non-concur in the amendment, and strike out that particular section.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 11, section three, line five, to strike out the words, "the same as the present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury," and to insert "$3,000 per annum;" so that the clause will read:

That the President shall appoint in the Treasury Department, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the clerical force now authorized by law, the following clerks and employes are hereby authorized in the several Departments and offices hereinafter specified, to be employed and continue only during the rebellion and for one year after its close, namely:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, one clerk of class four, one of class three, eight of class two, and fourteen of class one.

In the construction branch of the Treasury, one superintending architect, one assistant architect, two clerks of class four, four of class three, two of class one, and one messenger at an annual salary of $600.

In the First Comptroller's office, five clerks of class four and one clerk of class four substituted for one of class one.

In the Second Comptroller's office, eight clerks of class four, eight of class three, eight of class two, and fifteen of class one.

In the First Auditor's office, two clerks of class four and one of class two.

In the Second Auditor's office, two hundred and six clerks of class one and one clerk at $900 per annum.

In the Third Auditor's office, two clerks of class four, two of class three, five of class two, twenty-four of class one, and one messenger at a salary of $700 per annum, and two laborers at an annual salary of $600 each.

In the Fourth Auditor's office, five clerks of class four, nine of class three, nine of class two, thirty-five of class one, and one laborer at an annual salary of $600.

In the Treasurer's office, four clerks of class four, two of class three, seventeen of class two, and six of class one. In the Register's office, four clerks of class four, six of class three, six of class two, eight of class one, and one messenger at a salary of $700 per annum.

In the office of the Commissioner of Customs, one clerk of class three, three of class two, and four of class one.

In the office of the Secretary of the Navy, two clerks of class four.

In the office of the Adjutant General, two clerks of class four, eight of class three, nineteen of class two, and seventy-four of class one.

In the office of the Quartermaster General, thirty clerks of class three, sixty of class two, seventy of class one, and six laborers at an annual salary of $600 each.

In the Paymaster General's office, nine clerks of class three, twenty-six of class two, seventy-five of class one, three messengers at an annual salary of $840 each, and four watchmen at an annual salary of $600 each.

In the Commissary General's office, ten clerks of class two and thirty of class one.

In the Surgeon General's office, two clerks of class four.

In the office of the Chief of Ordnance, two clerks of class four, seven of class three, eleven of class two, seventy-four of class one, and nine laborers at an annual salary of $600 each.

In the office of the Chief Engineer, one clerk of class four and one of class two.

And the several clerks and employes authorized by this section shall be appointed by the heads of the departments to which they are severally attached, and the amount necessary to pay their salaries from the time of their appointment to the 30th of June, 1864, is hereby appropriated therefor; and the heads of said several departments are hereby authorized to employ females instead of any of the clerks herebefore designated, at an annual compensation not exceeding $600 per year, whenever in their opinion, the same can be done consistently with the interests of the public service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to propose an amendment to that amendment. After line thirty-two, on page 13, I move to insert the following:

In the Fifth Auditor's office, one clerk of class four to be substituted for one of class three.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have another amendment to propose to that amendment. It is to insert at the end of the section:

Provided, however, That the clerks hereby authorized in the Treasury Department and its bureaus shall not be in addition to the temporary clerks now employed therein, under former appropriations for that purpose, but shall include the same.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of an Assistant Register of the Treasury Department and a Solicitor for the War Department, and for other purposes," approved February 20, 1863, as limits the office of the Assistant Register of the Treasury to a term of one year is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to offer an amendment. On page 4, after line seventy, under the head of "Interior Department," to insert the following:

To supply deficiencies in the Department of Agriculture for the current year, as follows:

For the purchase of sorghum seed, $2,000.

For rebuilding shop in the propagating garden, $800.

For postage, $1,320.

For carpets, furniture, and cases for fruit, $350.

For fuel, $300.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know of the Senator how much that amounts to in the whole?

Mr. SHERMAN. About four thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to any part of that amendment except the $2,000 for sorghum seed. I should like to have some explanation of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inform the Senator that the Committee on Finance received a long communication from the head of the Department of Agriculture asking for an appropriation of $12,470 to supply certain deficiencies. Most of the items, much the larger items, were not strictly deficiencies; they were new expenditures which he proposed to incur, and which we, on reflection, thought ought not to be granted. But on inquiry I found that sorghum seed had been purchased, and the Commissioner of Agriculture justified himself on this ground, that by the early frosts of last fall the great body of this seed in the country was destroyed, and he thought that it was his duty to make a purchase to supply that deficiency; and on the whole, as the great body of the seed was destroyed, and this crop was becoming very valuable indeed, we thought it was perhaps proper that he should supply the seed. It is true it is not the duty of the Government to keep the farmers of the country in sorghum seed, but as it could not be purchased in this country, and could only be got by importation, I thought, on the whole, the item was a reasonable and proper one, although the Commissioner asked for a much larger sum than we propose to appropriate.

The other items are made necessary by a change in the laws. For instance, there is the item of postage. At the time of the passage of the last appropriation bill he had the power to frank seeds, &c. Now he must pay his postage, and it is therefore necessary to appropriate money for postage. It seems, besides, that one of the buildings in the propagating garden was burnt during the last summer, and it was necessary to repair or rebuild it. The other items are made necessary by the increased price of fuel, and also by putting up in one of the rooms of the Department some cases for specimens of fruit from different parts of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The great objection which I have to this amendment is that the principle, the precedent is a very bad one, in my judgment. In the first place, I do not think it was the intention of Congress, when it made appropriations for the purchase of seeds, to do anything more than make experiments by introducing seeds into the country to ascertain whether the particular seed was a desirable addition to the farming interest; and if that fact was once ascertained the purchase of the seed that might be necessary to carry it on, the experiment being made, was to be left to the people themselves if they chose to continue the culture. This goes still further. It goes upon the principle that after the Government has introduced new seed from a distance and it has been found to be available and beneficial, the Government, if the seed should fail in any year, is to go on and supply the farmers with that kind of seed. In my apprehension nothing more was ever intended than merely to try the experiment in the first place, and then to leave the people of the country to purchase their own seeds, as they purchase other things for their own use. That, I take it, is as far as the Government ought ever to go. If we are to be held responsible to keep on hand a supply of every seed that is found to be valuable it necessarily supposes a great and continuing and increasing burden upon the Treasury; and it looks to me as if it would be very unwise and very dangerous to establish such a precedent.

There is another consideration. Is this matter to be left to the discretion of a Commissioner of Agriculture? We appropriate a certain amount of money and put it into the hands of the Commissioner, or the head of the Department of Agriculture, as he is called. Finding that his money is failing, or that he has spent the amount which Congress has chosen to appropriate, he says it is his business to look out and see what the necessities of the farmers of the country are with reference to seeds and other things, and if in his judgment they need more money, then he will spend the money without consulting Congress, and bring in a deficiency to Congress to pay the bill.

I take this occasion to say that I think the communication which was sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture to the Committee on Finance upon this subject, and which was afterwards passed over to the Committee on Agriculture, is certainly either one of two things: it is either the most impertinent or the most stupid communication that I ever read in my life, for it goes on to lay down these principles with absolute coolness: finding that there was a deficiency of money here and a deficiency of money there, and he thinking it best, considering the necessities of the country, to appropriate it here and there, he, in the exercise of his judgment, had spent this amount of money, and he now calls on Congress to make it good, and he insinuates that Congress made a very gross mistake in not giving him all he asked for last year, because he says if they had he should not probably be obliged to call for this deficiency, although it is altogether for a new thing. [Laughter.]

Several SENATORS. Let us have the letter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio has it. I think it would be a very interesting document as showing the views of the Commissioner of Agriculture or the head of the Department—I do not know exactly what they call him—the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, on the subject of appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the letter, and I send it to the desk to be read. As the honorable Senator from Maine has characterized it rather strongly, I think it had better be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you, with the reasons therefor, a request for an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Department of Agriculture made March 3, 1863, as follows:

For the purchase of additional seeds, sorghum, wheat, and vegetable, with exchange.....	$5,000
For ten thousand cocoons of alanthus silkworm from France.....	1,000
For expenses in the propagating garden, and rebuilding shop burned last summer.....	800
For material for report of 1863 by contributions, at five dollars per page, five hundred pages.....	2,500
For additional postage required by change of postal law, July 1, 1863, in collecting agricultural and meteorological statistics.....	1,320
For increased clerical expenses.....	1,200
For carpets, furniture, and cases for fruits.....	350
For increased expense of coal, &c.....	300

The amount required for properly conducting the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1864, was stated by me at $130,000. As, however, the Department has only just completed its first year and was regarded in some respects as an experiment, the amount asked was looked upon by the Senate as larger than was necessary under the circumstances, and $90,000 only were appropriated.

I have endeavored earnestly, by contracting in many respects the operations of the Department which I had wished to enlarge, by reducing the number of some clerks and employes, and keeping others at lower salaries than I ought, and by the most rigid economy in every branch of the Department, to keep the expenditure within that limit. I have not been entirely successful, and am obliged to ask for a further appropriation of $12,470 to finish out the fiscal year ending July 1, 1864. This added to the amount originally appropriated will still be much short of my former request and of the amount voted by the House of Representatives.

Some of the causes of this deficiency have been occasioned by circumstances unexpected at that time and beyond my control; while others which were anticipated could not be restricted.

The destructive frosts of last autumn in a large part of the West rendered entirely worthless many important seeds which I have been called upon to supply, chief of which is the sorghum, now becoming one of the most important crops of the country. In several of the large States the seed was so generally destroyed that I have felt obliged at the urgent call of the farmers to send abroad for a fresh supply of pure seed.

An increasing belief among the people in the feasibility of producing an excellent article of silk from the alanthus silkworm, and repeated inquiries for the means of its production, have led me to order a large quantity of cocoons from France, where it has proved a perfect success.

The extensive failure of the corn crops, with other causes, has created a great demand for new and different varieties of wheat for both fall and spring sowing, which has been met by importations from England, Russia, and the Mediterranean, and by purchases of improved varieties of American growth.

The very great and increasing interest in the culture of the grape, and the consequent demand for vines, has induced a large increase in the expenses of the propagating garden. I have also had to rebuild a workshop destroyed by fire last summer.

The success of my first annual report, and the eagerness with which it is sought, has led me to incur a somewhat larger expense in the collection of material and preparation for the coming one. The change in the postal law taking effect on the 1st of July last, under the decision of the Postmaster General, has forced upon me quite a large expenditure for postage in being obliged to send prepaid envelopes to several thousand correspondents who furnish at home and abroad the statistics, agricultural, commercial, and meteorological, from which the monthly reports have been compiled. The vastness of the work, too, calls for a large clerical force to conduct it properly.

The increased demand made upon me by the farmers from all parts of the country for everything within the scope of the Department has exceeded my most sanguine expectations, and has in a measure compelled me to exceed by a small amount the original appropriations.

I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

ISAAC NEWTON, Commissioner.

Hon. W. P. FESSENDEN, Chairman Finance Committee, United States Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I agreed as a member of the Committee on Agriculture that the items now pending should be reported as an amendment to this bill. If I understand the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Finance he agrees to all except one item amounting to $2,000, to be expended in the purchase of sorghum seed. The chairman of the committee objects to that on two grounds: the first is, that this seed having once been introduced into the country it is not the duty of this Government to supply deficiencies hereafter. If the appropriation were intended to supply the demands of the country for the seed the objection would be well taken; but the amount proposed by the committee is so very small as to negative this idea. They propose it for the purpose of reintroducing the seed, early frosts over many of the States during the last autumn having destroyed the seed and partially destroyed the crop. Two thousand dollars is not a very large sum with which to procure pure seed from abroad to reintroduce it into these States. It is not to be sent to farmers in large quantities to enable them to plant fields, but in small packages of one or two ounces to enable them to again introduce it on their farms and plantations.

The other objection is, if I understand the chairman of the committee, that no head of a Department has a right to exceed an appropriation; and this, I think, as a general rule, is well stated; but the Senator will observe that the year has not yet expired, nor has the period of the year occurred when this expenditure need be made. It is only a proposition from the head of this Department. The crop need not be planted until the 1st of May. There is ample time to make the expenditure, if Congress should make an appropriation, in time to aid the farmer. If Congress should differ from the head of the Department on this question of course they will withhold the appropriation; the purchase will not be made; and no work will be done. I think the suggestion coming from the head of the Department at this time is wise and proper. He has not, as I understand it, exceeded the appropriation, but says that a few thousand dollars more will be necessary to enable him to carry out the ordinary purposes for which the Department was organized. I do not think, therefore, that the communication of the head of this Department is justly subject to the severe criticism implied in the Senator's remarks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amount, to be sure, is small; but the question is as to the principle of the thing. I laid it down as what I believe to be a safe principle, and the only one which we ought to act upon in this matter, that Congress ought to go no further (if so far as that) than to introduce the seed in the first place, and try the experiment to see whether it would be successful. We have agreed to that policy by our appropriations for the simple reason that perhaps private enterprise cannot afford to make these experiments. After we have made them, and they are successful, if there is then a failure of the crop let private enterprise introduce the new seed wanted in order to continue the crop, and not require Congress, because it is a small sum, or because it is for the benefit of the farmers, to appropriate more money and keep on introducing seed after the experiment has once been found to be successful. It makes no difference in principle whether it is to be sent out in large packages or in small packages. The question is whether it should go at all; whether, after having once settled the propriety of the thing, Congress should be called upon to make up to the farmers of the country their necessities in regard to continuing the crop afterwards. If you establish that principle there is no end to it; and now let me illustrate what is done in its application to other things.

For the last six years, to say the least of it, we have had the same kinds of small seeds, such as cabbages and other vegetables, introduced from Europe and distributed over the country, because they were found to be beneficial—the same kinds of seed over and over again. What is the object of introducing these seeds? It is to see whether we can get improved varieties. The whole system is wrong, in my judgment; but that is past; it has been adopted. But when we have once established the fact that those varieties are useful, and the people become acquainted with them, let the people send for them, if they want them afterward, and not hold that the Government is to buy them year after year and distribute them through the Department of Agriculture all over the country. Why should we pay for purchasing Winningstadt cabbage seed for six or seven years and send it all over the country? One year will establish the fact whether it is a good variety or not, and when that is done people will judge for themselves; but yet we have year after year precisely the same kinds of seed, the same qualities and the same descriptions, purchased by the Department and sent throughout the land. I think the principle is a bad one. We ought to confine ourselves to simply trying the experiment in the first instance, and if it is successful the people will get their own seeds; and if unsuccessful they will not want those varieties; and there is no reason why we should go on buying them.

As to the style of the communication which has been read, I read it entirely different from the reading of my honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN.] If I have done the Commissioner injustice as to the style of his communication as addressed to Congress, and the principles he has laid down, I am very sorry, and I shall be ready to apologize to him; but really I can put no other construction upon it than that which I have already stated, that having an appropriation for a specific object he thought in his wisdom that certain other things for which Congress had made no appropriation should be done; and therefore he ordered them to be done, and now sends the bill to Congress for payment. If I have misjudged him in that particular I shall be ready to retract anything of that sort, but I certainly cannot mistake the tone of his letter in which he says the House of Representatives voted a certain sum of money, the Senate chose to cut it down so much, and that was all that was agreed to; but experience has demonstrated that if his first recommendation had been followed there would be no necessity of asking for this deficiency!

Mr. HARLAN. I do not see that there is anything very remarkable in this. It was a new Department. The House of Representatives agreed to appropriate for it $130,000 and the Senate cut down the appropriation to $90,000. The Department had been established, and the number of clerks and the purview of the work of the office indicated in the law. The House of Representatives intended to make an appropriation to cover the necessities of the Department. In the opinion of the Senate a smaller sum would answer the ends of the law and the office. In practice it turns out during the year that the House of Representatives and the Senate were both wrong, that $130,000 were not necessary, and that $90,000 were not enough; that in the opinion of the head of the Department one hundred and two or one hundred and three thousand dollars would answer the ends for which the office was created for the current year. That is all there is in it, a difference of opinion between the two branches of Congress, alluded to by the head of the Department, and an expression of his opinion that both erred, one placing the sum a little too high and the other a little too low; that experience shows a larger sum to be necessary than the Senate thought sufficient and a smaller sum than the other House deemed sufficient.

I think it very probable that if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] was at the head of the Department all the papers that emanated from it would be of a higher style; but I suppose the principal question to be settled by the Senate is whether these items are necessary to carry on the proper functions of the Department. In my opinion this appropriation is necessary, is eminently proper, and hence as a member of the Committee on Agriculture I gave my concurrence to the opinion of the chairman of that committee that it should be recommended, and I am prepared to vote for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the first item, which appropriates $2,000 for the purchase of sorghum seed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel very indifferent in regard to the fate of this appropriation, but I think the Senator from Maine has done injustice to the Commissioner of Agriculture. I think no one can read his communication and come to the conclusion that it was the intention of the Commissioner to be disrespectful to the Senate, or to any one. He goes on, probably not in the most formal and diplomatic way, to ask for certain additional appropriations. He says that he organized his Department upon a certain basis, that he estimated that it would require for the expenditures of the present year $130,000. He says that the Senate reduced the appropriation from that amount to $90,000. Of that he does not complain; he says nothing disrespectful to the Senate, but he says that after this reduction he did make an earnest effort to confine the expenditure within the appropriation. He states that in some cases he gave less salaries than he might have given according to law, and he employed a less number of persons. He finally reduced his expenditures so that at the end of the year, if he was allowed his own way, his Department would not cost over $102,000. The $12,000 which he now asks for he has not expended, as I understand, but he simply submits to Congress his estimates for additional appropriations.

The Committee on Agriculture were desirous to economize as far as possible. We desired to see this bureau—it ought to be called a bureau and not a department—started on as economical principles as possible, and therefore we reduced his estimate from $12,700 to something between four and five thousand dollars; I have not computed the precise sum, but it is something over four thousand dollars. We allowed only those items which were really deficiencies. Postage, for instance, is one of them. When the regular appropriation was made he did not anticipate the payment of postage, but by a change of the law he is required to pay $1,200 postage. We allowed him that. A fire occurred which destroyed one of the buildings at the propagating garden. We allow for repairs of that. The only contingent item of the several he asked for which we have allowed is the appropriation for sorghum seed. He gives a reason why it may be politic to distribute sorghum seed among certain agricultural districts where the frosts destroyed the seed. If any kind of seed should be distributed among the agricultural community it is this kind of seed which cannot be bought in the market, and which must be imported from China.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know whether the committee informed themselves as to there being no sorghum seed in the market.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot say how the fact is from personal knowledge, but the Commissioner says that in certain large districts of country, and I know that fact myself as to a large portion of the State of Ohio, the sorghum was destroyed and the corn was very materially injured, probably to the amount of half the crop.

Mr. GRIMES. That I understand to be the fact, but I wanted to know whether the committee had informed themselves that there was no sorghum seed in the market, and hence the necessity for the appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. We did not go to inquire whether it could be bought here or there; we must take the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. He said it became important by reason of the failure of the crop to send abroad for seed, and we thought $2,000 was a small enough sum to be expended for that purpose, and we allowed it.

Mr. GRIMES. Why do you allow it if you do not know that the seed stores do not sell it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because the Commissioner of Agriculture said it was necessary. Now allow me to say to the Senator from Maine and to the Senator from Iowa that they apply to this estimate a different rule from that which they apply to the estimates of any other Department of the Government. The Senator from Maine has reported a bill here which contains this item:

"For the continuation of the north wing of the Treasury extension, fencing, grading, and miscellaneous items, $250,000."

That is a deficiency. If the Senator from Maine were to declare here, "We will not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to go on and anticipate so large an appropriation; it is a violation of first principles," &c., &c., it would be well enough; but you are applying to this small Department or small bureau rules which you do not apply to others. I say you ought to overlook some of the strict rules as to the smaller matters of appropriation and look chiefly to the large ones.

Now, in regard to deficiencies. Our deficiency bills have always been in my judgment too large, and I have been in favor of applying as strict rules to them as anybody else; but there are contingencies arising in the management of a Government like ours when deficiency bills become necessary. They are submitted to our judgment. If they are submitted to us in proper language we consider them, and this bill contains millions of dollars of appropriation—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to add nearly a hundred millions more.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred millions to be put in, and one hundred millions that grow out of a violation of the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can discuss that hereafter; that is my opinion; but at any rate these deficiencies grow up. If the Senator will only prescribe some rule in regard to deficiencies, and stand to it, and enforce it against all the Departments of the Government, I shall be very ready to join him, but we know it is not done. Every Department of this Government has in this bill appropriations for deficiencies, and we have not applied to any Department or to any branch of the Government the rule that the Senator now says is a correct one, and which I agree with him in principle is correct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio does not understand me. If I am wrong as to the money having been spent, if the fact appears from the communication that the Commissioner has not actually made the purchases, the remarks which I made on that point do not apply. What I objected to was that the head of a Department should undertake to do a thing which he was not authorized by law to do, and create a deficiency in that way. If he has not done that I am mistaken about it, and have done him injustice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think he has done it, judging from his communication. I have no other information from him on the subject than as I derive it from his communication. I have had no conversation with the Commissioner; but judging from his communication I infer that he has not incurred this expenditure, but he only says that he will need this money to carry out such and such objects during the current year. I do not understand that he has incurred this expenditure. He has not the money; he cannot draw money from the Treasury without an appropriation; and if he makes contracts in anticipation of the appropriation we have a perfect right to reject those contracts. The Committee on Agriculture have not allowed his estimates, but have gone on the supposition that the money is asked for future expenses. He may perhaps buy the seed that is wanted from the seed dealers in this country. He may perhaps buy the seed in Iowa, and thus facilitate its distribution among the farmers of Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, where the frosts were more seriously felt. He may not go out of this country, and probably he will not have time now to go out of the country to get this seed. It seems to me it is a very small matter to apply a strict rule upon. I think it is better to deal with this Department of the Government as we deal with others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator from Ohio—and I also call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN]—listen to the language of the communication:

"The destructive frosts of last autumn in a large part of the West rendered entirely worthless many important seeds which I have been called upon to supply, chief of which is the sorghum, now becoming one of the most important crops of the country. In several of the large States the seed was so generally destroyed that I have felt obliged at the urgent calls of farmers to send abroad for a fresh supply of pure seed."

Has he not sent? Again, and here is a new thing:

"The increasing belief among the people in the feasibility of producing an excellent article of silk from the silkworm, and repeated inquiries for the means of its production have led me to order a large quantity of cocoons from France, where it has proved a perfect success."

Has it not been done?

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems from the communication that it has been done; but we have not allowed the cocoons.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That brings him within the scope of my remark, that he undertook, without authority of law, without having any money for the purpose, of his own motion, because he judged it necessary, to introduce a totally new thing into the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will venture the assertion that there is not a head of a Department who has not done the same thing. This criticism is not applied to any Department or anywhere except to this little office, to the head of the Bureau of Agriculture.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator point out such a case? I know of none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will point out a case. Take the very case that the Senator suggested before. He is going to offer an amendment to provide for a deficiency of about ninety million dollars in the Department of the Secretary of War, where he proceeded without law to give a bounty of three or four hundred dollars to every soldier who might enlist in the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me state to my friend that the deficiency called for here, and for which I shall offer an amendment, does not touch that, and does not apply to it in any shape or form.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is one of those cases where the head of a Department has, in anticipation of Congress, made an order or a contract. That contract is void, and we may throw upon the Commissioner of Agriculture the purchase of these seeds, and compel him to pay for them out of his own pocket. He does all these acts at his own peril. But I say this strict rule which is now spoken of is not applied to any other Department of the Government, because they all do anticipate legislation by Congress. I will give the Senator another case, in which we all concurred and all approved and ratified the conduct of the Executive. The President of the United States, before we convened here in July, 1861, increased the regular Army of the United States, and issued several proclamations which it was conceded on all hands were not justified by law. He did those acts in anticipation of the action of Congress, and we all justified him, and I now justify him for that course. The Supreme Court of the United States had that very question before them in a recent case, and they said that those proclamations of the President, although not justified by law, although not within the constitutional power conferred upon the President, were yet valid because they were ratified by the subsequent action of Congress, and that ratification extended to the original act of the President and made it valid, legal, and binding.

So in this case. All these Departments do in anticipation of our action sometimes make contracts, and whenever they do so they do it at their own peril, and if we do not approve them we reject them.

I hope, therefore, this $2,000 will be allowed for the sorghum seed, and I think the Commissioner of Agriculture will, from the reproaches that have been cast upon him by the Senator from Maine, learn a lesson, and will probably be more careful in the future, and so undoubtedly some good will result from the debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One word in regard to the Senator's instances. If he can find any similarity between a state of the country when in order to save the country the President was justified in anticipating the action of Congress and the action of the Commissioner of Agriculture in purchasing cocoons, he may make the most of it. I think there is a very striking difference between the two cases. I stated before and I state now that there may be cases where the President is authorized to take very strong measures, but I have never applied that to the Departments; and with reference to what he calls the action of the Secretary of War, let me say that action was not the action of the Secretary of War out of which the case grew, but it was the action of the President when he issued his proclamation and authorized or directed that three hundred thousand further troops should be raised, and a certain amount of bounty paid them. That was where the difficulty arose. So far as the Secretary of War had taken any action he acted strictly within the law; he attempted to appropriate the money which he had received for commutation in a way in which he had a perfect right to apply it, and if it had been confined to that there would have been no breach of the law. But the President chose afterwards to issue his proclamation in which he ordered the levy of three hundred thousand men and promised them this large amount of money. It was his act, and not that of the Secretary. So far as that is concerned I expressed my opinion upon that heretofore, and just as readily and just as strongly as I now express my opinion in reference to the action of the head of the Department of Agriculture. I have not known such instances in the cases of heads of Departments, and I do not think an instance can be found of such action as this.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not agree with the Senator from Maine in the inference he draws from the language of the head of the Department, that these expenditures have absolutely been made. He does not say so, and it is not clearly inferable from the manner in which he makes these purchases. A large appropriation is made of many thousands of dollars to enable him to procure seeds generally. These are for spring crops and summer crops and autumnal crops. He has ordered from abroad, he says, a supply of wheat and other seeds. Other purchases will be made for the spring crops. He may have ordered seeds anticipating this appropriation in larger quantities than he otherwise would have purchased to supply the demand at this immediate period; but if Congress should withhold this appropriation he will limit the purchases for the spring and summer supplies; and this is all there is of it.

The appropriation has not been made in items, so many thousand dollars for sorghum seed and so much for wheat and so much for cabbage; but it is made in gross, and he makes a distribution of it so as to cover the various crops of the whole year, and I have no doubt that if Congress withholds what he requests he will be enabled to balance his accounts at the end of the year. I think that at any rate this part of the request ought to be granted. The committee do not recommend the whole of it. The purchase of silkworms and some other items that he asks for they do not recommend.

Mr. POWELL. As one of the Committee on Agriculture I will say a single word in favor of the proposition offered by the chairman of that committee. It strikes me that the appropriation which he has proposed for the Agricultural Bureau is so small a one that it should be adopted by the Senate without any hesitation. But the Senator from Maine, with his usual zeal in watching the Treasury, has poured out the vials of his wrath on the head of that bureau, in my judgment without sufficient cause. I think the Commissioner of Agriculture has managed his Department with eminent skill and ability. He is a man who is eminent for his practical knowledge as a farmer. He asks, for certain reasons set forth in a respectful communication to the Senate, an increase of the appropriation for his Department. The Committee on Agriculture partially concur in his recommendation, and propose an appropriation of four or five thousand dollars. For that the commissioner is very harshly denounced by the Senator from Maine.

Now, sir, where the head of this bureau asks one dollar for deficiencies, if you please, the heads of other bureaus and Departments ask millions, and we hear no such censure upon the heads of those Departments. We have voted $20,000,000 here at this session for the purpose of paying bounties which Senators declared were not authorized by law. Somebody did it, but nobody was denounced for it. The Senator speaks of other deficiencies of $90,000,000. Why did he not exhibit his ire toward the persons in whose Departments that deficiency occurred? If it is wrong to exceed an appropriation why not deal with the large criminals instead of the insignificant sum of four or five thousand dollars?

The Senator has made a general assault upon the distribution of seeds more than once. The Commissioner of Agriculture distinctly states in the paper which has been read to the Senate why he asks for this appropriation. The frosts of last summer destroyed in many parts of the country seeds of the greatest importance to the people throughout the whole country, and particularly in the great valley of the Mississippi. If the head of the Agricultural Department under the circumstances had ordered the seed and distributed it, when a frost in the month of August destroyed it, I think he would stand justified before the country. He is at the head of an interest that pays a larger amount of taxes than any other interest, that furnishes the soldiers to fight your battles, and yet it seems there is very grudgingly meted to this great agricultural interest a thousand or two thousand dollars to meet a deficiency caused by severe frosts and for the purpose of introducing some matters of the gravest and most important interest to the people.

If you say the law shall be obeyed strictly let it be so, but do not throw off all your ire upon a small appropriation of four or five thousand dollars for this great interest of the people, this great agricultural interest. The Senator from Maine says that when seeds are once introduced, if they are approved we should never call for another importation. He is much mistaken in that. It is known to every agriculturist in the whole country that these seeds frequently deteriorate, and the Commissioner should be able to bring them from the countries in which they grow to the greatest perfection and introduce them where they do not perfect themselves so well. Every agriculturist in the whole country, I venture to say, very frequently brings seeds from different latitudes and from different climates for the purpose of improving the article that he grows. It is so with the cereals, and it is so throughout all the vegetable kingdom. It would be exceedingly difficult for the farmers scattered through the country to send to China for an improved kind of sorghum seed. The Government should, by an appropriation of this kind, collect them where they can be distributed.

It seems to me that the assault of the Senator from Maine on this little appropriation has been very ferocious indeed. I hope that Senator will indulge his great powers in that way by assaulting some of the heads of those bureaus and Departments who ask for millions, and not for hundreds or thousands. I hope that the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will be sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All I will say in reply to the Senator is that he evidently does not understand the distinction, the point I made, and I shall not trouble myself to state it again.

Mr. POWELL. I understood it as the Senator made it. If he cannot make it clear it is not my fault.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot accommodate myself to some people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment offered by Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I offer the following items, to come in as one amendment after line seventy-eight:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the purchase and manufacture of arms for volunteers and regulars, ordnance and ordnance stores, $7,700,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of arms at the national armories, $700,000.

For clothing, camp and garrison equipage, $7,000,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Adjutant General's department, for the purchase of books of tactics, $35,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of War which explains the amendment.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, February 11, 1864.

SIR: The large increase of our military forces called for by the President's order of the 1st February, and the necessity for providing equipments, supplies, and transportation without delay, so that these forces may be ready at once to take the field, will more than exhaust the appropriations made at the last session for the present fiscal year; so that deficiencies should be immediately provided for to meet the necessities of the case. I have directed the heads of the bureaus of this Department to make out estimates, so as to cover all contemplated outlay and deficiency in existing appropriations for the remainder of the present fiscal year, which are herewith submitted to your committee.

You will notice that the greater part of this deficiency arises in the quartermaster's department, and relates to the purchase of artillery and cavalry horses, the provision of buildings and quarters, regular supplies of forage, &c., and mainly transportation of the Army, which last item constitutes nearly one half of the whole estimate of that Department. This large outlay is occasioned by the necessity of transporting the troops from the various States to the field of operations, of repairing and equipping the railroads constituting the lines of supply for the principal armies in the field, and of chartering vessels for transportation on the western rivers and at sea. The estimate is furnished by the Quartermaster General, upon whose accuracy and economy, in this respect, the Department is compelled to rely. Accompanying the estimates will be found detailed statements, from which the gross items are made up. Any further details that may be required will be furnished upon the call of your committee or of the Senate.

You will perceive, without any further remark from me, the importance of making this provision, in order that the bureaus may have funds in hand for the required purpose. It is hardly necessary to add that the appropriations will, of course, remain unused unless the exigencies of the service should require their expenditure.

Your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War,

HON. WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN, Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer some amendments to come in after line ninety-four of the bill. I will state in relation to them all that they are recommended by the heads of the respective bureaus and sanctioned by the head of the Navy Department. The first of these amendments is:

For additional repairs at the Norfolk navy-yard, $150,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not that a large sum? What necessity is there for it?

Mr. HALE. I will state that if my own individual opinion had been asked I could give a very short answer to the question which the Senator from Maine has put to me; but I have here a communication to the Secretary of the Navy from the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, dated December 28, 1863, in which the chief of the bureau says:

"I have the honor to present herewith a supplemental estimate for repairs at the Norfolk navy-yard. This additional estimate for present purposes is based on the large demands upon that yard for repairs of vessels of the Navy and their machinery. It is much more convenient both in time and money to make repairs at this yard than to send vessels to northern yards, where they are already so overrun with work that the wharves are now crowded with vessels awaiting repairs. The amount already appropriated and that asked for the next fiscal year will be inadequate to meet the demands upon this yard, which are far more extensive than it was supposed they would be when the estimates for the next year were presented.

"The ship gate to the dock must be entirely new, and is now progressing as rapidly as practicable, and, with the engine already completed, will absorb the money now appropriated and available."

That is all he says about that, and then he goes into a detailed estimate. I have nothing to say about it; it is the estimate of the bureau, and recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. The Senate will act according to their pleasure in voting upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do the Committee on Naval Affairs recommend it?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer another amendment of which the same thing may be stated: it is recommended by the bureau and the Department and the committee:

For wharf, machine-shop, bridge, buildings for naval stores, and other works at Port Royal, South Carolina, $144,600.

In regard to that the head of the bureau says:

"I also submit estimates for works at Port Royal, which at this time are indispensable; the stores for the South Atlantic squadron are concentrated at this point and at present there are no storehouses for their safe-keeping; consequently a very heavy expense is constantly incurred for demurrage, amounting in some cases to more than the first cost of coal. The machine-shop is indispensable; in fact this depot is one of the most important at this time of any of our naval stations. The expenditures on the wharf, so far as progressed, amounting to $34,987 50, have been charged to an appropriation under the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, and should be refunded as soon as a specific appropriation for this object can be obtained."

This is signed "Joseph Smith."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now offer the following amendment:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for filling in the grounds for the new foundry at the Brooklyn navy-yard, $45,975.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. HALE. The same as before. It is recommended by the bureau and the Secretary of the Navy and the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now offer a small amendment which is recommended by the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, and also by the Secretary of the Navy and the committee:

For temporary storehouse for provisions at the Brooklyn navy-yard, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer a similar amendment as a provision for Boston:

For temporary storehouse for provisions at the Boston navy-yard, $2,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make an observation in regard to these appropriations, and I do it now once for all. It is impossible in time of war for the legislative body to restrain appropriations. I have come to that conclusion, and I shall make no further effort. It is impossible for any committee to restrain appropriations, or for the Senate or for both Houses of Congress to do it in time of war. The matter must be left to executive discretion. I do not believe that any action of ours, however carefully guarded, will limit the expenditure of the Government in time of war. We must trust to the Executive. But if I could speak a word of warning I would enjoin on every Department to remember that money is the life-blood of this nation, and I do believe that there are many expenditures incurred by the Departments that are not necessary in time of war. They do not seem to know, they do not appreciate the value of money. Each Department of the Government looks only to the success of its own Department. The War Department necessarily looks to the force and power of the armies, the Navy Department looks only to the efficiency of the Navy. Each head of a Department expends money and calls for large appropriations, sometimes without remembering the difficulty of getting the money. I do not think we can restrain them. I do not know whether it is within the power of the President to restrain them; but I must make the assertion, with no purpose of creating alarm or trouble, that I do think all the Departments of the Government are lax and negligent sometimes in the amounts they call for for particular objects of expenditure that might be avoided. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member, I know is careful in regard to the expenditures of the Government; but he has offered an amendment to this bill which covers many millions; I do not know the aggregate; probably fifty or sixty million dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Near a hundred millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. We cannot tell whether these appropriations are necessary or not. Here is an appropriation of $30,000,000 for transportation and $7,000,000 for ordnance. How is it possible for us to say that $30,000,000 is not required for transportation, that $20,000,000 is enough? We cannot do it. We must take the estimates of the Departments, whatever they are, and upon them must depend this expenditure.

Now, sir, take a few cases that have occurred recently. Regiments whose term of service has yet one year to run have been transported a thousand miles and back, their services taken away from Knoxville—the very point where we are now in danger—they taken home, given thirty days' holiday, and taken back as veteran regiments; and this when their terms have nearly a year yet to run. Senators can easily compute the cost of transporting a single regiment from the places of service to the places of enlistment. In one case I am told there was a regiment which was either brought from Colorado to the States or taken from here to Colorado for the purpose of reenlistment. It seems to me that these expenditures are sometimes unnecessary, but we cannot restrain them now, and I want simply on this occasion for myself to enter a caveat. We cannot judge of the necessity of these appropriations; we must leave it to the Departments; but I wish there was some means in our power to restrain these enormous expenditures, and I believe that in some cases—I will not say where or when—these expenditures are beyond all reasonable limits.

Mr. HALE. In reference to this amendment, which is a very small one, and in justice to the bureau, I propose to read—

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no objection to it. It has been fully explained to me, and I concur in the propriety of it; but I wish to say a word on the general question.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What has been said by the Senator from Ohio may render me excusable for saying a word. In a very great degree what he has said is just and true. We cannot judge, unless upon some new proposition to incur expense for a specific object, and when that proposition comes before us we can examine for ourselves, and come to a conclusion whether it is advisable under the circumstances to incur the expense to effect that object. But the Senator has justly said that with reference to those appropriations which are made for war purposes, and merely for the purpose of paying expenses for troops, it is impossible for us to ascertain to what extent they may be necessary, and all we can do is to take the estimates in detail of the Departments as they are furnished.

For instance, we have conferred power on the President to call out a certain or an uncertain number of troops. We must leave that to him. The war must be carried on. If there is anything that the people of this country are agreed upon it is that no money that is necessary should be spared in order to accomplish the purposes of this war; and all the people of the country are calling upon the Government to put men into the field and to finish up the war as fast as possible. What can we do? Obviously we can do no more than to put power into the hands of the President to call out the men at his discretion to a certain amount, if we chose to limit him, knowing that he is the only person who can judge of the case. We cannot judge of it because we do not carry on the war, although we authorize it to be carried on. We must have our information from the Executive Government. Having put that power into the hands of the President he chooses to exercise it, and he calls for a certain number of men. When he has called for them we must provide the means for paying them and paying the expenses. Where do we go? For the expenses of the quartermaster's department we must go to the Quartermaster General, and he will tell us—estimating as well as he can from what things have cost heretofore under similar circumstances—what the expense will be in the future for the particular number of men called for. So with regard to subsistence we go to the Commissary General. There it is a little more definite. So in regard to ordnance of all kinds, large and small, we must get our information from those who are familiar with the subject, and we must trust to the officers themselves for economy in administration, because we do not appoint them; we have no power over the appointments except to reject them if we deem proper; we cannot tell what their qualifications may be, nor can they tell themselves perhaps until they are tried.

If I were in a position to make a suggestion to the executive department, if I might dare to raise my voice so high as to expect that it would reach the executive department, I would say that I should deem it a very wise course, if he was about to call out a certain number of men, to inquire, in the first place, how many were necessary, (as he undoubtedly does,) and whether he could dispense with any of them, and what they would probably cost; and then, in the next place, to ascertain from the Treasury Department whether the money could be had to pay them. If they cannot be dispensed with, if they are indispensable, we must have them without reference to money, and pay as we can; but if we can get along with a less number and accomplish our purpose, although not so well, the question is well put whether the Treasury will meet this expense.

That, however, is a matter for the President. If he does not choose—it is to be presumed that he does—to call his Cabinet around him and lay before them his plan and say, "I propose to call out so many men; can the money be had?" &c., and to ascertain all those things before he issues his proclamation, what then? If he chooses to do so he will have a certain number of facts and all the Departments of the Government will be prepared for it. But if he prefers to go on and call out the men and take his luck about it and inquire afterwards, we must take our luck with reference to getting money to pay them. There is no other way. It is to be presumed—and I dare say we cannot presume otherwise—that all this is done and that it is accomplished in the most economical and proper way possible, with due and formal consultation of all the Departments of the Government, to know whether a specific plan can be carried out. If, however, it is not done so, when the law is in the process of being executed as we have made it and the President is exercising his discretion as to a certain number of men and calling them into the field, then when that is done, as we have authorized it we must provide the means, and we must act simply on the data we get from the Departments, for we can get none anywhere else. We have no judgment to exercise on the subject.

They will make many mistakes, undoubtedly; and the country must take the consequences of their mistakes. If they are very gross ones they arise from not having the proper kind of officers. If we have not got the proper kind of officers it is the duty of the President to find men who are capable of carrying on the Government and doing these things properly, if there are any such in the country. I suppose it cannot be done any better than it is.

I make these suggestions for the consideration of Senators to show the infinite difficulties under which, as my friend from Ohio says, we labor. In regard to some of these items we cannot undertake to cut them down, we cannot take that responsibility; we do not know but that they are necessary, and we must leave things to their ordinary course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I was apprehensive that the state of things which has been disclosed by the remarks of the Senator from Ohio existed. I was afraid it was so, that we had surrendered up to the Executive not only the control of the Army but the money of the nation; and that Congress was simply here to vote what was asked. Now we are told both by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the Senator from Ohio that we can know nothing about it, we have got to take these bills just as they come to us from the Department. Surely, if that is so—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will pardon me. I confined my remarks exclusively to war expenses, and did not extend them to what are civil expenses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, war expenses; an estimate comes in here, as I understood the Senator from Ohio to say, $30,000,000 for transportation; and he says we cannot tell anything about it, whether $30,000,000 is necessary or not. How can they tell in the War Department any better? Surely a committee of this body could have the same sources of information that they have there. If we are simply to take their statement, if we are to have no investigation beyond that, there is the end of it. But is it not practicable to have some inquiries made as to the expenses of transportation, outside of the quartermaster's department, to test to some extent the correctness of these claims of the Government? That, surely, was the intention of the men who framed the Constitution. The theory of our Government is that Congress is to have some control over the expenses of the Government; and so particular were they in regard to that point that they provided that appropriations for the Army should not be made for more than two years; we cannot make them for a longer period.

It seems that we have come to a state of things when the Finance Committees of the two bodies tell us that we have nothing more to do in regard to these large appropriations than simply to vote the amounts that are asked. I confine it to the large appropriations, for of course the Finance Committee can see how much is necessary to be appropriated to pay for particular services where the amount of compensation is prescribed by law, and can see that only the necessary amount is appropriated for that purpose. They can determine how much it will take to pay our ministers and consuls abroad when their salaries are fixed by law. It is a mere matter of computation to see how large an appropriation will be necessary to pay the annual expenses. So of all the salaried officers of the Government. But it does seem to me that we ought to have some check on these other expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to submit the matter to the Senator from Illinois, because I do not wish him to misunderstand me. I will take the case of the Quartermaster General. How is it possible for the Quartermaster General to know beforehand what will be the operations of the Commander-in-Chief? Sometimes a single movement will cost an immense sum of money which he could not have anticipated. Take, for instance, the transporting of several army corps from Vicksburg to Knoxville. The cost of that transportation and the necessity for it could not have been foreseen by the Quartermaster General. The number of horses that would be killed in such a terrible march as that could not be known by him when he made his estimates. It is impossible even that the best officers could estimate precisely for such contingencies. The Quartermaster General has written enough letters—they are on the desk of the Senator from Maine—giving the details and the bases of his opinion. If the Senator from Illinois wants to know the details he can examine the letters. We have them. We have the bases of the opinions of all the heads of bureaus; but when you come to examine the subject you find that you cannot fix upon an estimate or even approach an aggregate of the expenses of that character. In regard to the pay of soldiers we know precisely. We can state the exact sum it will require to pay one hundred thousand soldiers a year, and can show the materials on which the estimates are based; but in regard to the quartermaster's expenses it is not so. The expenses of the quartermaster's department may be safely set down to be greater than the pay of the soldiers. That you will find to be a correct rule. The expenses of the quartermaster's department are generally greater than of the pay department, and so with the commissary department, and so with many other departments of the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the committee cannot arrive at it, how in the world can the Quartermaster General arrive at it? It is a mere guess on the part of the Quartermaster General, it would seem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He gives the data on which he bases his opinion. The transportation of so many men such a distance has cost so much, and if we go over precisely the same ground in the same way, it may be the same thing, but as the Senator from Ohio suggests it may be entirely a different thing.

The Quartermaster General asks for what he thinks will be necessary. If it is not all spent, very well. If it is all spent, and more, we must make up the deficiency. The Senator will see that in the very nature of things all the expenses cannot be foreseen. A single battle may destroy an immense quantity of ammunition, and an immense number of horses, as well as a very large number of men. These losses must be made up. So of other things. We must, as I said before, get the best information and the best judgment we can from the officers at the head of the several bureaus who are accustomed to consider these things, and act on their judgment, for ours is absolutely good for nothing. Unless the same circumstances again occur, even the estimate of the Quartermaster General may be of little value.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that his would be worth just as little as that of any of us, because he cannot tell what battles are to be fought next September any better than we can. It is a mere matter of conjecture. It looks, then, as if it was mere guesswork as to what would be required. If that be so I think that the Finance Committee ought to provide for a permanent committee of Congress who should be in session all the time to keep a watch on this thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have a committee on the conduct and expenditures of the war.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the committee on the conduct of the war is charged with other duties. I should think it would be quite enough for one committee to look after expenditures.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me tell my friend they are at this very time examining into contracts made by the War Department for transportation and supplies.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But in connection with a great many other things. I am speaking now particularly of those expenditures of the Government which it seems there can be no basis upon which to estimate, and it does seem to me that under the system we have adopted and upon which we are acting, and according to the disclosures of the Finance Committee, we leave to the discretion of the officers to use just as much money as they please, without any limitation whatever upon them. They may pay four prices for transportation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot help that. We cannot say they shall not do it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A Senator says they have done it. Certainly Congress ought to exercise in some way supervisory power over it. I hope it can be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How can Congress say beforehand what prices they shall pay?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we could tell something about what the prices should be. We may not be able to tell them exactly, but we know something about the ordinary prices of transportation. We know what a wagon costs, or we can tell about what it costs. Certainly Congress could exercise some sort of supervision over it. After the disclosure that has been made here to-day, I would be in favor of having a permanent committee of Congress, not only during the sessions but during the recess, whose business and sole business it should be to inquire into the expenditure of the vast amount of money which is appropriated for these uncertain objects. I would charge them with no other duty than to see that the $50,000,000 appropriated for transportation purposes, and the large amounts appropriated for other similar purposes, were properly expended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Would you give them the expenditure of money?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; I would give them a supervisory power over the Executive Departments of the Government. I think that is what the Constitution means; and I do not think we discharge our duty properly if we just come in here and vote money by the hundred million without looking at all to the disbursement of it. If there is no way by which we can get estimates to show how much money is needed, then I say we ought to keep the power in our hands, or keep a committee in session all the time to supervise the expenditures, because the intention of the Constitution and of the people of this country is that Congress shall supervise the disbursement of their money.

Mr. WILSON. How would a committee do it during the recess?

Mr. TRUMBULL. During the recess they could keep control of the public money so far as to see how it is disbursed; and they could report to Congress when it meets. We could learn whether abuses exist or not. And let me tell the Senator from Massachusetts we can sit ourselves. Congress ought not to adjourn one day in the year if it is necessary to stay here in order to retain control over the moneys of the country. We should not be saddling on the people of this country an expense of a thousand million dollars annually, or half of it, without knowing where the money goes. If it be so that there is no other way, I would appropriate the money from month to month, and see where it went; and I think we but poorly discharge our duty to come here and remain a short time and vote money by the hundred million without knowing whether it will be needed or how it is to be disbursed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the difficulty, I apprehend, arises in the nature of the service in which we are engaged, and not in the supervision of the committee. War is an uncertain matter, and we are obliged to have a large fund appropriated in advance out of which we can expend according to the exigencies of the service. Now let me ask the Senator from Illinois what would be the use of his committee to sit in the vacation? They cannot appropriate the money when Congress is away. You would have to appropriate the money beforehand and while Congress was here; and then, if there should be a great exigency for the transportation of an army, or a call for money, must the War Department run after that supervisory committee to inquire whether they shall have wagons to carry a hundred thousand men to Knoxville? Certainly not. To make that scheme effectual they must; otherwise it would be of no use whatever. I would suggest that they take the committee along with them and appropriate as they go. [Laughter.]

Nor if Congress stayed here could we do any better. From the very nature of the thing we must trust to the men who have this matter in charge and who expend the money. Could we be called on from month to month and day to day by the heads of Departments to appropriate money for this purpose and that, saying, "We want to use it to-morrow?" The difficulty is in the very nature of the service. We must trust to the men who have these services in charge. The best they can do is to say to us, "In our judgment we may want so much money. To make the thing perfectly secure for the nation, for we do not mean to fail, you had better appropriate a little more, so that we can have abundance to carry us through, and trust to us who administer the fund."

It is the only way we can do and administer the fund and carry on the war as we ought to do; and no hand of mine and no vote of mine shall ever withhold from the Executive the money he wants, and then throw upon me the responsibility of the failure of this undertaking. I am ready to put the resources of the Government at the use of the Executive, and I would put upon him the responsibility, and say to him, "Sir, the country looks to you to carry this through, and to carry it through quickly and effectually." I will withhold nothing; and it is in the nature of the service in which we are dealing that this difficulty arises.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I simply want to tell the Senator from New Hampshire that I will not shirk my responsibility. I will not shirk from the responsibility that is on me as a Senator, as a representative of one of the States here, and put the responsibility on the President, and tell him that I will hold him responsible. I will hold him responsible for the discharge of the duties that the Constitution confers on him; but when the Constitution has imposed a duty upon me I will not put all the men and all the money of this country into the Executive's hands, when the Constitution has placed it partially in my hands as one of the representatives here in the Senate. I am not disposed to do any such thing. I think there is a responsibility on us, and that we are charged with seeing where the people's money goes. While I am for putting down this rebellion as quickly as the Senator from New Hampshire, while I am willing to use the power of this Government to accomplish it, I will use it according to the Constitution; and when the authority to raise armies is placed in Congress, when the authority to raise money is placed in Congress, I will not come here and abdicate, and say that the people of the nation and the money of the nation, without law, without the action of Congress or the supervision of Congress, shall be all placed in the hands of the Executive. The declaration of the Senator from New Hampshire goes to that extent. We had better abdicate, then, and go home, and say to the people, "The President is clothed with the whole power of the nation; your Congress need meet no more."

Mr. CLARK. I do not think I shall be found shirking any duty or responsibility that may be cast upon me. People may differ as to responsibilities, and have different views. The Senator from Illinois may think as a member of the Senate that before he votes a dollar or a hundred dollars the quartermaster or the commissary must tell him exactly what he wants it for. "Now, Mr. Quartermaster, what do you want this hundred dollars for; where are you going to carry your men?" "Well, I want it for the purposes of the war." "But where exactly?" "Well, I do not know where the army may be; it may be at Knoxville, it may be at Chattanooga, it may be toward Mobile." "But where? I want to know just how many men you are going to move, and how much it is going to cost apiece." "I cannot tell," says the quartermaster. "Then you shall not have any money; I will not appropriate anything; we will not vote anything if you do not tell us exactly where you are going to spend it." "Well, I cannot do that." Then where is the quartermaster to get his money?

I am not by any means for abdicating, and I said no such thing. No remark that I made can be construed, or tortured, even, in that way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that he would place the whole power in the hands of the President and hold him responsible.

Mr. CLARK. I said no such thing. I may have used language that possibly the Senator may have misunderstood, and interpreted that way, but I did not mean any such thing. I do not mean to abandon any right or prerogative of Congress, but I do mean to give the President power enough to put this rebellion down, if I know what it is. I mean that he shall have men enough, if they can be raised, and I mean that he shall have money enough to arm those men, and to provide for those men when they go into the field, and I do not mean to hold the purse-strings so tight that those men shall be sacrificed without accomplishing the purpose. I am willing to assume my rightful share of responsibility; I want the Executive to assume his, and I have no doubt he will, and we must act together. We must give him the means and hold him to the execution. That is what I mean. We must look to him for the execution when we have provided him with the means, nothing more.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not think it is at all probable that such a committee as is suggested by the honorable member from Illinois will be appointed, and if it should be appointed I would ask in advance that I may not be made one of its members. They will have a very troublesome time of it. If I thought that such a committee was necessary I would be as willing to serve upon it as anybody else; but with due deference to the member from Illinois, I do not see that the committee could effect any good purpose with reference to the mischief of which he complains and we all complain. The honorable member is right in saying that the Treasury of the United States is by the Constitution placed under the control of Congress. That is done by the provision which says that money shall not be drawn from the Treasury without an appropriation by law; but it happens to us, as it must happen to all Governments, that it is impossible in advance to tell what money will be necessary for the purposes of Government during any one year, and that difficulty is very much enhanced if the country at that time is in a state of war. That may be illustrated by mentioning a few instances with which the Senate must be very familiar.

When we commenced this war very many hoped, very many believed, that it might be terminated in a year. I think the Secretary of State was so sanguine as to believe that sixty days would bring about a restoration of the Union; but he has been obliged to continue his prediction from sixty days to sixty days almost de die in diem. Under the impression which certainly prevailed throughout the country that the Government would not want the means that we now find we do want to bring about a termination of this rebellion, you were able in the beginning to buy horses for $100, and mules for a much less price than they can be obtained for now. You got your forage for your horses, your oats, for some thirty cents a bushel; you cannot get them now for less than a dollar. You got hay for some fourteen or twenty dollars a ton; you have to pay now forty dollars a ton; and so on in proportion. At that time nobody supposed, I think, that it would be necessary to bring into the field such immense armies as we have; that it would be required of us to travel over the country through which these armies are now traversing and must continue to traverse for some time. The expense, therefore, of the transportation is infinitely more than anybody supposed would be the case.

All that can be done even in a time of peace, and it is peculiarly true of a time of war, is for the proper Departments of the Government who are to superintend the particular expenditures connected with their Department to approximate to accuracy by their estimates.

There is no danger to the Treasury, as I think the Senator from Illinois will see when he comes to reflect in a moment. The question is whether if an appropriation is exhausted and the country is not served as it was supposed that that appropriation would serve it, the Executive Departments are authorized to go beyond it, not by paying money, because they cannot pay any money, they cannot exceed the appropriations, but upon their own responsibility, trusting to the approval of Congress afterwards, by incurring debts. Whether these debts are to be paid or not must depend on Congress, and when the matter comes before Congress they have the clear right, restrained only by the moral obligation under the necessities of the country, to refuse to make the appropriation.

But how would the difficulty be obviated by the appointment of a standing committee? I do not understand the honorable member from Illinois to propose that that committee should have the privilege of appropriating money from the Treasury or of taking money out of the Treasury without the consent of Congress. Congress would not be willing if it had the authority to transfer to any committee the power to take money out of the Treasury in point of fact in any mode in which it could be done. All that such a committee could do would be to see that the money which Congress has appropriated is not misapplied by the Executive. How are they to do that, situated as we are now? They may say to the Executive, "You are giving too much for oats, you are giving too much for hay, too much for horses, too much for mules, or paying too much for transportation." The executive officers say they cannot get them for less. If they are honest, (and nobody charges them with dishonesty,) if the heads of these bureaus are not themselves pilferers from the Treasury, you are bound to believe that they are not giving more than they found to be necessary in order to obtain what the service of the country demands. Is the committee to tell them what to give for horses and for mules, for oats and for forage, for transportation; what they are obliged to give in order to obtain the forage, to obtain the transportation? If so the war stops; must stop.

But there is another thing connected with the expense. Not only does it depend on such elements as those to which I have just referred, but it depends very much on the nature of the campaign in which the Executive is about to embark. Where shall the war be carried on? Shall it be carried on upon the Mississippi, throughout the Southwest into the mountains of Tennessee? The Executive may think that it is there that the rebellion is to be finally destroyed, and the committee may be of a different opinion; and the committee may say, "Keep the fight here, where transportation is less expensive, forage is less expensive, everything else will cost Government less." That certainly would not be the function of such a committee, because to give the committee that function would be directly to usurp a function exclusively given to the Executive by the Constitution.

I do not see that any possible good could arise either from Congress remaining in session permanently or from their constituting a committee to superintend the expenses of the Government. It is true, as stated by my friend from Ohio, that perhaps these gentlemen in the several Departments, each being anxious that his own Department shall achieve perhaps more than any other Department, or at least not to be behind any other Department, do not look to the necessity of limiting their disbursements as closely as they should. All that we can do, as I agree with him, is, to let them know in advance that however willing we may be, in order to save the good name of the Government, to meet all the obligations which they incur in behalf of the Government for the use of the Government, it is our purpose to hold them to a moral responsibility before the country if they unnecessarily exhaust the appropriations which have been made, or unnecessarily incur obligations outside of the appropriations. I think the apprehension that they will be held so responsible, as they certainly will be, is the only restraint that we can in the nature of things submit them to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it comes, then, in the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, to this: that the provision of the Constitution which declares that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law merely means that the Congress of the United States shall make a general appropriation of any amount which the Executive shall ask; and that is the check which the Constitution places upon the Executive!

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but he certainly could not have heard me. I said we were under no obligations to make the appropriation. It is for Congress to say whether they will appropriate or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand the Senator so. It is for Congress to say whether they will appropriate; but he is advocating an appropriation just such as the Executive asks. Now I wish to inquire what the provision of the Constitution amounts to if it is the duty of Congress, his duty and mine, to vote for any appropriation that the Executive asks?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said nothing of the sort.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator did not say that in so many words.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say it in substance, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not undertaking to quote the language of the Senator. I am trying to state his position for him.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I mean to say is that you have misunderstood my position, or I was very unfortunate in explaining myself. I have not said, and certainly do not think we are obliged to appropriate any amount the Departments may ask. When the appropriation is before us it is for us to decide whether that appropriation is required or not. We may rely as evidence of that necessity upon the estimates made by the Departments; but we have a clear right to go into an investigation of those estimates and satisfy ourselves if we can that the estimates are greater than they should be, for the same reason that I think we have a right, and that it is our duty, if we are satisfied the estimates are less, to make the appropriation larger.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, let us go back and see what this discussion has sprung up about. It arose out of some remarks made by the Senator from Ohio in regard to the large appropriation here—I think he stated it at $30,000,000—for transportation. He said we could know nothing about whether this estimate was right or not, and he could see no way to supervise it. I do not attempt to give the words of the Senator from Ohio, but the purport of what he said was that we had to appropriate just what was asked by the Executive for this particular kind of service. Now, when I tell the Senate we ought to exercise in some way some supervision over these vast appropriations of thirty millions and fifty millions and a hundred millions for transportation, I am met by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from New Hampshire by a specific case. The honorable Senator from Maryland talks about the price of oats, and desires to know whether an inquiry shall be made as to how much is given for oats or not. Sir, I do not advocate any such proposition as that.

The Senator from New Hampshire goes into detail in the same way, and desires to know whether we must first inquire what it will cost to take a man from this place to that before anything is done. I propose no such thing. Sir, I think the Constitution means something, and that we should not simply appropriate in large sums of tens of millions what the Executive asks, without knowing whether it is necessary or not, and without keeping any supervision over it. I believe that to do that is a departure from the requirement of the Constitution and a shirking of the responsibility that is upon us. Now I want to know what the Constitution means? What is virtually the position that these Senators assume? It comes to this; this is the principle that is laid down here: that in a time of war we are to appropriate whatever is asked.

Mr. CLARK. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, you did not say any such thing; but you did say you were for placing the power in the Executive and holding him responsible.

Mr. CLARK. Not without limit.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The limitation was subsequently. I know the Senators say not without limit; but what limit does he propose? I have made no motion, but I have suggested that it might be possible to exercise some sort of supervision over these large appropriations, and because I made the suggestion I am assailed. Now I say if we do not exercise some sort of supervision over these large appropriations we do not in my opinion perform our constitutional duty. I repeat, when the Constitution said no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law it did not mean simply that we should get together, and, by a general appropriation of $50,000,000 for one item, place that sum in the hands of the Executive and let him use what he pleases of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose $50,000,000 is needed for that item, how would you do? Cut it up in twenty different pieces?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can hardly conceive of a single item that would amount to $50,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Transportation will amount to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Transportation embraces a great many things. I am not very familiar with these appropriation bills; but I have looked a little at the appropriation bills made by the British Parliament, and I observe they are a great deal more particular than we are in their estimates. Things are not lumped to the extent that they are here. I think it would be practicable for us to exercise a greater supervision over these appropriations than we do. That is what I want. I am unwilling to agree to the declaration of the Senator from Ohio that we can exercise no supervision at all over them. He did not use that language, but he said substantially we made these appropriations without knowing whether they were necessary or not, simply relying on the estimate of the Department. Then when we come to inquire about that estimate we are informed that it is a mere guess there. I say the spirit of the Constitution requires us to resort to all the means within our power to keep control of the money of the Government. I do not think we do that when we appropriate $50,000,000 to a single item without knowing anything about how it is to be expended.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me that the difficulty with which the honorable Senator from Illinois contends is a difficulty inherent in the nature of the case. As has been said it is impracticable to know what the expenditures of the quartermaster's department, for instance, for any particular branch of that service will be for any six months or any shorter or longer time; and hence the Quartermaster General cannot in the first place make an estimate. All he can do is to make an approximate estimate; and in the nature of the case the committee can have no better evidence than he himself can furnish. The remedy, it seems to me, is not in the appropriation, but in the expenditure of the appropriation.

• If it is fair to assume that the appropriations made by Congress fall into the hands of honest, faithful men, then there need be no particular apprehension about the appropriations. Suppose an appropriation of $50,000,000 be made for the quartermaster's department for the single item of transportation, specifically. Upon the assumption that the officers of that department are faithful and honest, where is the harm?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maine will allow me I should like to inquire where would be the harm, then, according to that argument, to just say to the Executive in a bill of five lines that he shall have all the money that he wishes to carry on the war, and could take it out of the Treasury? If our officers are all honest and faithful they will only take what is proper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my colleague will pardon me, I will ask the Senator from Illinois whether he means that we in making the appropriation shall say, You shall have so much for railroads, so much for steamboats, so much for sailing vessels, so much for mules, so much for wagons? If that is what he means I should like to have him sit down and do it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps not all those items, but I think there might be some subdivision of them; something better than a mere appropriation of two or three hundred millions. I have not before me what the amount for the year is, but I suppose it will amount to about two hundred million dollars for transportation. I should like to be informed as to the amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a deficiency for this year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know this is a deficiency; but what is the appropriation for the year for this item?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I forget. I suppose it will be something like the appropriation for last year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Probably $100,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. More than that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Two hundred millions probably. I think there might be some restriction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the Senator make it.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me, therefore, the committee in the nature of the case are obliged to make such appropriations as the department having that particular branch of the service under consideration ask for; and in that view I should have no hesitation in voting the appropriation provided I had confidence in the department asking the appropriation. Now, sir, I am sorry to say, and I am sorry to feel obliged to stand here as a sense of duty to say, that in the case of the quartermaster's department of the Army I have not that confidence which would enable me to vote an unlimited appropriation for expenditure under the direction of the officer at the head of that department.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator, even in that view of the case, how he can help it; whether the war must not go on? Even though the quartermaster's department may not be fit to be trusted, yet where is there a remedy? Must not the appropriations continue to be made? Otherwise, how shall the war be continued? Will you send your armies to battle without supplies?

Mr. MORRILL. I was about to say what remedy possibly Congress might have over a subject of that sort; and that is, in supervising the expenditure. Now, I want to state a case within my own knowledge touching this branch of the service, and touching this question, as I think.

The Senate a year ago or more directed a special committee to investigate certain charges which had been preferred against the quartermaster's department in the outfit of the Banks expedition, so called. The committee, in the discharge of their duty, proceeded to New York to investigate the outfit of that expedition. They found that a steamer called the Niagara had been chartered for that expedition at a cost of some six hundred dollars a day, that she had proceeded on her voyage carrying some five or six hundred soldiers, and the first night out had foundered and put into Philadelphia, was there condemned as unseaworthy by the inspectors, and forbidden to go to sea. The troops were disembarked and sent to their place of destination in other transports. The committee further found on testimony from the best men connected with the service in New York, inspectors of the port and persons who had been familiar with the character of that vessel since she came upon that route, that she was notoriously unseaworthy. In the language of one of the inspectors who had given special attention to her, and who testified that he had known her since she was brought there from the lakes, she was so rotten and defective that he would not put a dog on board of her to go to sea unless he wished to drown him; and furthermore, that she was not only unseaworthy but she was not even suitable to run upon the North river.

With the knowledge of that fact reported by the committee to the Senate, and published by the Senate, and of course within the knowledge of this department, the quartermaster's department purchased that vessel to run to New Orleans, and there to be employed in the service on the river, for the sum of $30,000—paying $30,000 for a vessel known by the department to have been condemned as unseaworthy, so rotten and decayed as to be unfit for any service at all. An inspector of the Government at New York had declared that her value consisted alone in her iron and her machinery, and that the whole of it was not worth over six or seven thousand dollars. With that knowledge testified to, and reported to the Senate, and by the Senate published to the country, this quartermaster purchased her at the sum of $30,000.

That is not all, sir. With this evidence before the country and before the department thus authoritatively by a committee of the Senate, that committee declaring as its conclusion that she was unseaworthy, and that the charter was a fraud on the Government by the contractor, and ought to be canceled and the contractor held to responsibility—with the knowledge of that evidence and those facts, that quartermaster, since this Congress has convened, has sent an account made up for her service of some twenty-five thousand dollars to the Comptroller, to be audited and paid this claimant, when that vessel performed no service except the service from New York to Philadelphia under the circumstances I have related.

Sir, I take no especial pleasure in stating these facts; but they are facts ascertained by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the Senator whether he did not offer a resolution to inquire into the subject some time ago?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has it been answered?

Mr. MORRILL. It has.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know what the answer is.

Mr. MORRILL. I am inquired of by the Senator from Maryland whether a resolution of inquiry was not offered in the Senate some days ago in relation to this subject. There was; and an answer has been made to the effect that such an account has been presented but has not been paid. I have followed the account to the Second Comptroller and to the Auditor, and know the fact that the account was sent to the Second Comptroller, and it not being passed and audited there, was afterwards presented to the Second Auditor. Since that resolution was introduced into the Senate it has been withdrawn by the quartermaster.

Now, in answer to my honorable friend from California, I suggest that there ought to be some remedy over the expenditure of these large appropriations which I agree the committee is bound to report to the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I have but a word to say, sir, on the statement now made by the honorable Senator from Maine. I cannot conceive, notwithstanding this important statement that he has made, that a corrective can be applied by limiting the appropriations. I do not think the remedy is there; but I will suggest a remedy.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will pardon me, I agree that the remedy is not in that direction.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well. Then I will take the responsibility, on the statement made by the Senator from Maine, of which we can have no doubt as it is stated by him, to meet just that class of cases, and meet them by meeting that one first; and that is by a resolution passed by this Senate requesting the President of the United States to dismiss that officer from the head of the quartermaster's department. I undertake to say further, that if the President of the United States retains such a man in such a position, with such facts proven, he perverts the executive function; and finding that that was done, I would then resort to a resolution by the Senate requesting his dismissal from the public service. I am prepared also, I will say further, upon such a state of facts to introduce such a resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely rise to make an inquiry of the Senator from Maine, whether it is within his knowledge that the facts which he has just narrated have been brought home to the knowledge of the President of the United States?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose my colleague did not mean to say that the Quartermaster General personally had anything to do with this, but some inferior officer in the department.

Mr. MORRILL. I mean to say that what I have stated was done with the knowledge of the Quartermaster General, as I understand.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. HOWARD. I concur then cordially with the suggestion made by the Senator from California, that if these facts are so, and I see no reason to doubt them, as they are narrated upon the credit of the Senator from Maine, it is high time they were laid before the President of the United States in order that he may exercise his proper functions upon the case, and dismiss that officer in disgrace from the service of the United States, if it shall turn out that these facts are substantially true.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing to say in regard to the Quartermaster General of the United States. That is a matter that he must answer upon his official responsibility; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one very important departure in the intercourse between the executive and legislative departments.

When I first became a member of the House of Representatives the annual letter of the Secretary of the Treasury always conveyed to us the estimates, and the appropriation bills were framed upon those estimates. If any other Department of the Government called for appropriations, the estimates were sent to the Secretary of the Treasury to know whether or not they were proper. That was the practice then. I want to call the attention of the Senate to this important change. The estimates do not now come from the Secretary of the Treasury. None or very few of the estimates that are included in this deficiency bill come to us from the Secretary of the Treasury. At the beginning of the annual estimates submitted to us by the Secretary of the Treasury there are estimates for deficiencies amounting to $4,180,581 13. That is all that by law the Secretary of the Treasury provided for. He submits these deficiencies to us, and we are bound to recognize them as proper, unless Congress thinks differently. But the whole of the estimates of the War Department come to us directly, not through the Secretary of the Treasury. What is the effect of it? How can any person, how can any Secretary of the Treasury tell what he will be required to furnish day by day, or month by month, or year by year?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is certainly mistaken. All the deficiencies that were known at that time were submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury. These other deficiencies have all been ascertained since. There was no need of sending them to the Secretary. They come directly to us while the bill is before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then this remarkable state of facts occurs: on the first Monday of December, when these estimates were submitted to us, there was only a deficiency of $4,180,000; and in the War Department only a deficiency of $156,000. Now, does the Senator see, or can he see, where all these deficiencies, amounting to nearly a million dollars, have grown up since this estimate was submitted to us?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will look at the bill he will find that there are only two items in it for the War Department. One is that very $156,000, and the other is for the salary of the new Secretary, created by a bill which we ourselves have passed at this session. That is the only deficiency that was known.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment last offered by the Senator from the Committee on Finance embraced over fifty million dollars for the War Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One hundred million; and what are the facts? Did the Senator attend to the reading of the letter of the Secretary of War? They come up in consequence of the proclamation which the President has issued since that book of estimates was printed and sent to us calling out two hundred thousand more men.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that is a sufficient explanation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Here are all the items in this letter. The Senator can look at them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have seen them. That is not sufficient to account for this large deficiency.

There is another important consideration. By the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives is the body that must control the expenditures in a great measure. They are made the guardians of the public Treasury. This Senate is not. From its peculiar organization it is supposed not to have charge of financial questions, taxes, and the like; and therefore it has been the practice of the Government for appropriation bills to originate in the House of Representatives. I am not technical about the rights of the two Houses; but I wish to call attention to the fact that this communication for these large expenditures is not sent to the House of Representatives, at least until after they have passed the deficiency bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because it was not known until after they passed the deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The deficiency bill came to us a good many days ago; and how long is it since that proclamation was issued? I am calling attention to these facts to show that the executive department does not observe those rules and restraints which in times of peace have been held to be necessary. It seems to me we ought to enforce those rules.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I take upon myself to deny the statement made by the honorable Senator from Ohio entirely. The estimates are made precisely in the same way under this Administration that they always have been. All the deficiencies that are known at the commencement of the year are given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him are sent in, as they have been heretofore. After the session commences divers other deficiencies are found; and they always have been since I have been in Congress; and in the course of the examination of a deficiency bill we have communications from the several Departments stating what they have discovered or what they want. It is sometimes found, as in this instance, after the committee has reported the bill. This deficiency bill as originally reported to the House of Representatives was reported several weeks since, before the President's proclamation was issued, and it passed the House of Representatives a fortnight since. The estimates could not be made up in an instant. As soon as the proclamation was issued and the Departments had time to turn round they sat down and made their estimates for the expenditures occasioned by this new proclamation calling out additional men and sent them here. They are sent to the body that has the bill in charge—the body is acting upon it. They were sent here for the reason that we had the bill. It is the customary and ordinary mode of proceeding. I know from my acquaintance with the course of business on the Committee on Finance that there has not been the slightest departure in any one particular from the ordinary course of business about it; and I do not think my friend from Ohio will be able to point out any such departure.

As to the principle that he lays down in regard to these appropriation bills, I say the House of Representatives has no more right under the Constitution to originate an appropriation bill than the Senate itself, and the Senator cannot find it anywhere. The custom has grown up in the House to start them. I am very glad it has, because it saves me a great deal of labor, and we have submitted to it. But once since I have been a member of the Senate we examined this whole subject of the constitutional right of the Senate to originate an appropriation bill, and we decided here unanimously that we had that right, and we passed an appropriation bill and sent it to the House. The House put itself on its dignity. They did not undertake to say we had not the right to introduce it, but they laid it on the table, and sent us back the same bill verbatim as it originated with us as a House bill. That is all the difference. There was no departure from our bill at all. We submitted to it, because we did not want to have a quarrel.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine undertakes to correct the statement I made, and he is erroneous in his statement. This bill passed the House of Representatives and was sent to us on the 27th of January, 1864. I say that nearly all the items that have been put on this bill were within the reasonable knowledge of the War Department, and within the knowledge of these various Departments, and might have been sent to the House of Representatives. I know it has always been a dispute whether the Senate can originate an appropriation bill, and that depends on the construction of the language of the Constitution whether an appropriation bill is a money bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Constitution uses the words "revenue bill."

Mr. SHERMAN. At any rate there was always a controversy between the two Houses on that point. The Senator has referred to the case where the Senate originated an appropriation bill. The House, if I remember aright, unanimously laid that bill on the table, and then took up the bill seriatim, and sent it back as a House bill. There was no objection to the items in the bill, but the House refused to pass it because it originated in the Senate.

My only design in calling attention to this subject was to make this remark, that it is absolutely impossible for the Government to be carried on unless there is more information, harmony, and acquiescence in its various Departments. It is impossible for the Treasury Department to know how much money is to be provided for a certain purpose unless the estimates are submitted to the Treasury Department. I know that a practice has grown up recently of throwing these deficiencies into either House by bureaus and by heads of Departments. I have not complained of it, but only wish to show that it is not in accordance with the original practice of the Government, and I think the correct practice of the Government.

Mr. HALE. I simply rise to ask what is the question before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

For temporary storehouse for provisions at the Boston navy-yard, $2,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. The statement made by my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] affects the character of an officer of this Government with whom I have had some personal acquaintance for many years, and for many more years an official acquaintance. This is the first time that I ever heard he was ever suspected of doing anything designedly wrong; and it was therefore that I asked my friend from Maine whether the resolution of inquiry had been answered and how it had been answered. I have not seen the answer. I understand, however, the answer to be that the money was not paid; that the account sent in by the deputy quartermaster to be audited and settled had not been paid. Now if the honorable member from Maine spoke from his own personal knowledge, that the acts which he has detailed to us were known to the Quartermaster General, and that he authorized the purchase of the vessel, it would present him in an attitude in which it would be the duty of the President of the United States I think at once to interfere by his removal.

I do not understand the honorable member to state that he has any personal knowledge on the subject at all. He supposes that the Quartermaster General was informed, first, of the appointment of the committee, and, second, of the result of the investigation, and that he purchased the vessel with that knowledge. Now I cannot suppose that there was actual knowledge brought home to him before the vessel was purchased that these acts had been done. The transactions in that department are so numerous that I can very readily believe an investigation into any particular transaction is not at all times in the mind of the Quartermaster General. I should be very unwilling to believe, without proof which would leave the mind free from all doubt, that the Quartermaster General, who has reached now a life of some fifty years, was capable of a transaction so gross as that which has been stated by the Senator, provided he was acquainted with all the facts.

I only rose for the purpose of saying that when the credit of an officer of the Government, whether he be a high officer or a low officer, is impeached on the floor of the Senate, it is but just—and nobody, I am sure, would recognize the justice of it more readily than the honorable Senator from Maine—that he should have an opportunity of defending himself in some way or other.

Now, in relation to the other matter stated by my friend from Ohio as to the mode in which these estimates are sent in, I think the trouble arises very much from what I understand is a practice, so far as I know, for the first time adopted by the present Administration. From what I can learn they have no Cabinet meetings. I do not know what the practice of General Washington's Administration was; but in all the antecedent Administrations, except, perhaps, his and that of Mr. Adams, nothing was done of a general nature which affected the country at large, more particularly when the country should happen to be in a state of war, which was not brought home to the knowledge of every member of the Cabinet, and his opinion taken as to the influence of a particular measure proposed upon his own Department, as well as his opinion upon the propriety of measures with reference to the country at large. I understand that the practice which has been adopted by this Administration is, when the Secretary of State wants to effect anything in his Department he comes and speaks to the President for himself, and the first knowledge any other member of the Cabinet gets of what is going on is when he sees it in the newspapers; and so in relation to the other members of the Cabinet.

I have no potential voice with the President. If I had I would try to keep him in a path much straiter than the one he is pursuing. I believe that he and his Cabinet are doing what they understand to be for the best. If I believed what I have heard coming from his friends on this floor in relation to him and his Cabinet I should think the sooner we got rid of the whole of them the better for the country. But I suggest the mistake arises from the very fact of their not getting together and deciding for themselves in joint council what is the best policy to be pursued. The President is entitled not only to the advice of each individual member of his Cabinet, but he is entitled to the advice of every member, not given separately to him, because he does not hear what are the opinions of the other members. He may not be as well informed as the other members of the Cabinet, and the collective wisdom may be a great deal better than the wisdom of any one member of the Cabinet. We have been going on in this way, I fear, from time to time ever since this Administration came into office, not from any practice that they thought would lead to any bad result, but from the fact that the antecedent usage has been departed from. I speak from some personal knowledge of what the usage has been, and I will be confirmed in that by my friend, the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.] Nothing was ever done during the Administration of General Taylor without the knowledge and approval or disapproval in part, if anybody disapproved, of every member of the Cabinet.

Now the Secretary of the Treasury, who ought to be advised of what are to be the demands on his Department, cannot, in the nature of things, know what they are to be unless the Secretary of War tells him, or the President tells him, "It is probable we shall call for some two or three hundred thousand men." But as I understand it, according to their practice, and according to their practice it must be so, the President determines to make a call for some two hundred thousand men without consulting the Secretary of the Treasury, or without consulting anybody but the Secretary of War. The call is made, and the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury is first called to it by seeing in the gazettes of the day a proclamation from the President calling for five hundred thousand more men. He sees what the trouble is to be in his Department; he sees, or may fancy that he sees, almost bankruptcy. It is enough to run the man mad. That would be bad in itself to those who know him; but it is enough to run the country mad, as I think.

I hope, therefore, that more potential voices than I can claim for my voice will inculcate upon the President, and upon every member of the Cabinet, but especially upon the President, that it is important he should on all these occasions take the advice of his Cabinet; and if he cannot get a united Cabinet, if there is a difference among them which cannot be reconciled, if there are any personal animosities among them, let him get rid of them, and get men who can agree.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like very much to finish this bill to-night. I think we can do it now. The debate is almost concluded.

Mr. WILSON. At the request of the chairman of the committee I most willingly withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, who was compelled necessarily to leave the Senate a few minutes ago, desired me to offer this amendment—an amendment which he was instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to propose to this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to make a motion in relation to adjournment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot make it until this bill is finished.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will depend on whether we finish this bill to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to insert after line seventy of the bill the following:

That the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter be the same as that of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; and the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the payment of such salary for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it had not been for the suggestion of the Senator I was just going to say that I presumed no Senator would object to this amendment. It places the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in respect to his salary, precisely in the same position as the principal assistant in the other Departments. Why shall it not be so? Will the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, say that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have a less salary than the Secretary of any other Department? If the rule ought to apply to a Secretary—and they ought all to be equals in respect to salary—ought not the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior to be equal in respect to his salary to the First Assistant Secretary of any other Department? It seems to me the announcement of the proposition is sufficient without argument.

I need not speak of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. He is known to all Senators. He brings to that important position very substantial abilities and very highly accomplished attainments; and I hope this amendment will be adopted. It is right and fair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is not familiar with the previous legislation on this subject, I think. There are but two of the Assistant Secretaries who receive more than three thousand dollars: one is the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and the other the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I regret very much myself that the salary of either of them was raised, because it has led us into very great difficulties. At the last session of Congress a proposition passed the House of Representatives to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary of State to $4,000. We rejected it in the Senate. The Committee on Finance reported against it. The reason was that as soon as that bill was introduced propositions came in from all the other Departments pretty much, from the Department of the Interior and from the Post Office; that is to say, from the Assistant Postmasters General, and from all except the Assistant Secretary of War. The Assistant Secretary of War has an infinitely harder place than the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and he receives but $3,000. We have made another Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in this bill, and we have fixed his salary at $3,000. We struck out $4,000, as it stood in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. Senators must be aware that the moment they extend this matter any further they must necessarily increase the salaries of the whole of these Assistant Secretaries.

It is but very recently that there was any Assistant Secretary of the Interior at all. The bill creating that office was passed a few years ago. I think it is since this Administration came into power that we made an Assistant Secretary of the Interior. There never had been one before. They got along without it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What necessity is there now for the office?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a question that is gone by. But the Secretary of the Interior applied for an assistant. He gave his reasons for it. They were thought sufficient. We gave him an Assistant Secretary and the salary he asked for him. The present Secretary of the Interior took the office of Assistant Secretary under the then Secretary. Everybody knows that there is not anything like the business in that Department now that there has been heretofore. It has fallen off very much in the Patent Office, very much in the Land Office, although it has increased very considerably in the Pension Office. But since this Administration came in we have given them a new officer, and now the new officer comes in and claims to have his salary raised on account of the labor.

I have as much respect for that officer individually as I have for any of the Assistant Secretaries. He is a man of ability, a man of integrity, and I dare say a most estimable gentleman; but there is no reason why we should raise his salary in particular; or at least there is less reason for raising his salary than that of almost any other Assistant Secretary in the Government; for while the business of the other Departments has very largely increased the business of that Department as a whole has not increased at all. As I said before, we made him, or rather his predecessor, who is now the Secretary of the Interior, Assistant Secretary when there was no assistant before in that office. Why should we raise his salary now and bring upon ourselves the necessity of increasing the salaries of all the Assistant Postmasters General and of all the other assistants in the different Departments? As I said before, we made a mistake, in my judgment, in ever raising the salary of any of the assistants from $3,000 in the first instance; but we stopped at the last session on a full discussion of the matter, and I hope we shall adhere to our determination as then expressed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My understanding is that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, of the Treasury, and of War, get $4,000 each.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Assistant Secretary of War has but $3,000; and the business of that Department is infinitely larger than that of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Second Assistant Secretary of War gets but $3,000; but my understanding is that the First Assistant gets $4,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He gets but $3,000, and more than that, he said he would resign if we raised his salary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not anticipate that there would be any hostility to a proposition which seemed so entirely fair as this. As opposition shows itself, if the bill is not likely to pass to-night, and the amendment can be proposed on Monday morning, I will withdraw it until the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is in his seat, because I desire his assistance. I do not want this proposition to be defeated. Before I take my seat I desire to say that the Committee on Public Lands felt it proper to present this amendment for the reason that among their other duties is found the duty of revising all the operations of the General Land Office. I will withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That being withdrawn, I wish to suggest an amendment, to strike out lines sixty-eight, sixty-nine, and seventy, on page 4 of the bill, in the following words:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Arizona and the clerks in his office, $4,250.

Now, sir, when the bill to create the Territory of Arizona was under consideration I opposed its passage. I did not think there was any necessity for any such Territory there; and among other reasons which I gave was that it was incurring an unnecessary expense for the salary of Governors and judges and surveyors and other officials.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] I remember—I think it was he—replied to me that these officers were not to be paid until they entered upon the discharge of their duties down in Arizona. I know I made the point that the officers could not go there, and that it would be incurring an expense for nothing. I was answered and it was put in the bill that they should have no pay, and here it is in the law:

"No salaries shall be due or paid to the officers created by this act until they have entered on the duties of their respective offices within the said Territory."

I want to know from the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this surveyor general and his clerks have ever been there at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I confess my inability to answer the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I hope he will consent to strike it out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I find the estimate coming from the Interior Department. There are four items coming from the Interior Department. Three of them were stricken out. We have left the fourth, thinking as the law provided for these officers it was well enough to make an appropriation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the law provided that they should not be paid unless they had been there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These appropriations all came from the House; and I confess that having exercised the pruning-knife so strongly, cutting off three fourths, three out of the four items, I thought it would seem no more than reasonable under the circumstances to leave the fourth. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Illinois is a very good reasoner provided you give him the premises to stand upon. He assumes that there is no surveyor general in Arizona; but, unfortunately for his argument, his assumption is a false one. There is a surveyor general in Arizona.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is a fact. He went on last fall.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who is he?

Mr. HOWARD. Has he got there yet?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not received a communication from him since he went to Arizona; but I had a communication from him from Santa Fé while on the way. Has not the Governor entered on his duties?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose not; and I hope there is no appropriation for him. I shall oppose it if it comes in.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly; I suppose he is in Arizona long ago.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; there never has been a Governor there; and I do not believe the surveyor general has done any duty there at all.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; they are all there.

Mr. HOWARD. The Governor and judges started some time ago, in September or October, to go there, and have been traveling ever since. They are on their road there. I do not know whether they have reached there or not as yet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As my friend from Michigan suggests that they have started to go there and are on their way, it is our business to make an appropriation, and the business of the Executive Government not to pay them until they have entered on their duties. We should make the appropriation, otherwise they will not be able to pay them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But this is a deficiency bill. We should appropriate for that in a general bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Considerable time will elapse between now and the 1st of July next.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is providing for a deficiency before it occurs. I understand some gentleman from Wisconsin was appointed surveyor general. My friend from Wisconsin may be able to tell us his whereabouts; but I am informed that no surveying has been done in Arizona. I may be incorrectly informed. I should like to inquire of the Land Office to know whether there has been any surveying done there. It appears that he has had several clerks in his office, and we are to pay him for his salary and that of his clerks $4,250. I do not remember what the salary of the surveyor general is, but I think that that would certainly pay his salary for a much longer period than he can have been there. One of the arguments used to pass that bill was that they were not to be paid until they entered on their duties there. Now I want to hold gentlemen to the arguments that they presented when they got that bill through the Senate, to create a Territory that we did not have any control of. I am very sure no Governor went to the Territory last summer, because Mr. Gurley, of Ohio, who was appointed Governor, died, and he never went to Arizona. That is very certain.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And Mr. Goodwin, of Maine, was appointed Governor of Arizona, and is undoubtedly in Arizona discharging the duties of his office. I received a communication at the commencement of this session from some of these gentlemen from Santa Fé, and they were then on their way.

Mr. POMEROY. I saw all these Government officers on their way last summer after they left the Missouri river, crossing the plains. I presume they are there now. They had all got an outfit, and were on their way with an escort.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree entirely with what my friend from Illinois says, that the Arizona bill expressly provided that the salaries of these officers should not begin until they got there. That is all perfectly right.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that these gentlemen went out there with a military escort?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; I undertake to say that. They got their escort at Fort Leavenworth furnished by the Government.

Mr. CONNESS. Then all I have got to say is to suggest to the Government that they continue to draw all the officers for the Territories in the extreme West from the extreme East. Wherever they can find a man in the East who wants an office, let them send him to the extreme West with a military escort. It will not cost much.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend from California will allow me to suggest that he is a little mistaken when he regards Wisconsin as in the extreme East. Wisconsin is just the center.

Mr. CONNESS. I forgot about the Wisconsin man.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And when, in the good time coming in the future, we come to embrace all North America within the United States Wisconsin will be just about the center of the whole.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire whether these surveys were made under military escort?

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know whether any surveys were made. I am talking about the officers of the Territory; and by the way, as their traveling expenses are not paid by the Government it does not make much difference to the Government whether they come from Maine or California.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know if the military escort is not under pay?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it does cost something.

Mr. POMEROY. But no more than if they remained at Fort Leavenworth. The escort get no extra pay for going out there. I forgot to state that the secretary of New Mexico, who has been a secretary for years, and was entitled to an escort, was with them when I saw them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is a secretary of a Territory entitled to a military escort?

Mr. POMEROY. We never have sent a secretary to New Mexico without an escort.

Mr. NESMITH. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair before putting that motion will lay before the Senate a House bill for reference.

The bill (No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburg, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. ["No objection."] The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 37) relating to the interference of military and naval officers in elections, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it do not pass, accompanied also by a written report, which I ask to have printed.

The report was ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. YEAMAN asked leave of absence for four weeks, on account of pressing business in Kentucky.

Leave of absence was granted.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting his annual report of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE FINES AND DEDUCTIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting statement of fines imposed on and deductions made from the pay of contractors during the year ending 30th June, 1863; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURT IN INDIANA.

Mr. ORTH asked unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed an act (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ORTH demanded the previous question on the third reading.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask whether the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the conscription bill does not come up in order this morning as the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish first to make an explanation to the House. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask consent of the House to take up this bill at two o'clock to-day. The bill has just come in from the printers, and gentlemen would perhaps like to run their eye over the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before voting on them. We think it right that they should have the opportunity of doing so. If that arrangement can be made I propose to go on with the bill at that time.

There being no objection, the bill was postponed till two o'clock to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to advise gentlemen of one or two modifications that are necessary to be made in the printed bill. For instance, in section seven, the commutation to be paid by Quakers is printed at $400. It should be $300. There should also be added to section twenty-six the amendment adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri:

And in all cases where slaves have been heretofore enlisted in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payments of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as well as to those who may hereafter be recruited.

CHAMPLAIN COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I ask consent that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce may report back a bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which my constituents are interested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a bill for removing the port of entry in the Champlain collection district. The bill, as introduced, provided also for an increase of salaries. The Committee on Commerce refuse to recommend an increase of salaries, and only recommend that portion of the bill which has a local interest.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amendment of the committee be concurred in, I will have no objection.

There being no objection,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported back a bill to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburg, and for other purposes.

The bill repeals the act of March 3, 1863, changing the port of entry for the Champlain district from Plattsburg to Rouse's Point, and reestablishes Plattsburg as the principal port of entry for that district, at which the collector of customs is to reside, with a deputy collector at Rouse's Point.

The amendment striking out the section providing for an increase of salaries was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAROLINE M. HUGHSTON.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the petition of Mrs. Caroline M. Hughston, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

It was so ordered.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call committees for reports of a private character, commencing with the Committee of Elections.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to call the attention of the House to a mistake made in the printing of the conscription bill.

Mr. STILES. I object.

LOWRIE AND GRAY.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 171) for the relief of Jacob S. Lowrie and George A. Gray; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM G. BROWN.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William G. Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ELI THAYER AND OTHERS.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of F. A. Holden, Eli Thayer, Hannah Barton, D. W. Frisby, and Hiram Bloss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

DARIUS S. COLE.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill for the relief of Darius S. Cole; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of certain wagon roads for military and postal purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to it, unless it be proposed to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DRIGGS. I make that motion.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

CHURCH LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 179, concerning lands in the State of California.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is simply this: these lands belong to the Catholic church, and the bishop is acting as trustee. They are in a remote part of the State, and the church desires to sell them that they may use the funds for their institutions elsewhere. I move that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY LANDS.

Mr. HIGBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a bill to amend an act approved July 17, 1854, entitled "An act to amend an act approved September, 1850, creating the office of surveyor general of public lands for Oregon," &c., with a substitute.

Mr. COX. This is a public bill, and I object, as there are others entitled to precedence.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. This is a private bill, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HIGBY. I indorse what the Delegate has stated. This is purely a local matter.

Mr. COX. If there is no discussion of the bill, I withdraw my objection.

The substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Has this bill been recommended by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. HIGBY. The Committee on Public Lands has recommended the passage of this bill. The committee had full information on the subject before they took action. The lands have been disposed of by the Territory of Washington. They have erected thereon buildings, and have a fine, flourishing school, and they have some thirty thousand dollars as a fund out at interest. They had power to dispose of the lands. The people who have the lands, however, and to whom they were transferred by the Territory of Washington, feel uneasy with the title given, and come to Congress for a sufficient title. The bill is only for the purpose of quieting title to these lands.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit the following report:

The committee having come to no agreement on the following resolution, report it as committed:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House the regular number of copies of the work prepared by the late librarian, entitled "A Dictionary of the United States Congress;" and that the Clerk of the House shall pay a suitable copyright, provided the same does not exceed two dollars per copy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether such a resolution was adopted by the House and referred to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine and ascertain.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who made this report can state whether this resolution was referred by the House to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. It was.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not this resolution involve an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The money is to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his motion to lay on the table. It seems to me that this book is as important to this House as Barclay's Digest is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that we take the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WILSON. I call the yeas and nays upon its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Al-ley, Ancona, Anderson, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Denison, Dixon, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Herrick, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalsfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—61.

So the resolution was adopted.

Before the above result was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I rise to a question of order before the result of the vote is announced. I do not know how the matter is to be remedied, but I am assured by the clerk who would properly have control of the file of resolutions that this resolution upon which the Committee on Printing has acted, and which they presumed was properly referred to them, was never in fact acted upon by the House and referred to that committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I submit that that is no question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that there has been a misapprehension upon the part of the committee in submitting the report to the House acting upon the supposition that the House had referred the matter to them. I suppose the House can arrest proceedings as soon as the fact was known that the ground upon which their action was predicated was erroneous.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot take the responsibility of arresting proceedings after the action which the House has taken upon it. The House can reverse its action by a motion to reconsider. Committees have cognizance of matters in two ways—by bills or resolutions being referred to them, and secondly, by petition. The Chair inquired of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] if the resolution had been referred to the committee. He said it had been, and the House has now acted upon it.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the motion to reconsider I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. If the motion to lay on the table should not prevail, would not the motion to reconsider be before the House?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. MORRILL. And it would be in the power of any member to move to amend the resolution so as to allow any member who desires to have the book in his library to pay the money out of his own pocket.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalsfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—69.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KASSON stated that Mr. Blow was absent from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. A. W. CLARK, was confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

The SPEAKER said: As there has been a question raised in regard to this resolution, the Chair will state that upon an examination of the files and Journals of the House it has been found that upon the 17th of December last the memorial of Charles Lanman, including this resolution, was presented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] and referred to the Committee on Printing; so that the committee had cognizance of the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. It appears, then, that the House did not in fact refer the resolution to the committee, but it was filed with a memorial under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The House did not adopt it, or it would not be before the House now; but it was referred under the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would seem that under the act of 1856 members have to pay for these books or have the amount deducted from their salaries; so that the result of the vote does not materially affect the public interests. In this I may be mistaken.

RAILROAD FROM NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of a line of railroad communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and to constitute the same a public highway, a military road, and a post route of the United States.

Several MEMBERS objected.

DANIEL WORMER.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Wormer; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to let the vote referring the bill in relation to a grant of lands to Michigan to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be reconsidered, and let the bill be printed, and recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I recommended the committee may report it back and put it upon its passage without due consideration.

Subsequently Mr. HOLMAN withdrew his objection, the vote on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was reconsidered, and the bill was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CIRCUIT COURTS ON THE PACIFIC.

On motion of Mr. McBRIDE, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 51, amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1863, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SPEEDY TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a bill to secure the speedy transportation of the mails, and moved that the same be recommitted to the committee, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. CLARK.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the Committee for the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John W. Clark and the affidavits of John Brannon and McIntyre Key, and the same were laid upon the table.

PAY OF OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of criers and officers attached to the United States courts for the southern district of New York for fixed salaries; and the same was laid upon the table.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF DISTRICT COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of members of the bar of the District of Columbia, praying an increase of the salaries of the judges of the District of Columbia; and the same was laid upon the table.

JOSEPH FORD.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming the title of Joseph Ford to certain lands in Rice county, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. THAYER. I will ask the House to put this bill upon its passage; and with the consent of the House I will make a very brief explanation of the facts on which the bill is founded.

The bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the facts upon which it is based are these: Joseph Ford is a private soldier in the Army of the United States. In 1855 he filed a preemption claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land situate in Rice county, in the State of Minnesota. In 1858, three years afterwards, he purchased, in good faith, a land warrant which he located upon those one hundred and sixty acres. He entered into possession and expended about twelve hundred dollars in improvements upon the land thus entered. Five years subsequently, to wit, in the year 1863, he was notified that the land warrant which he had purchased in good faith and located, and under which he had entered upon and improved those lands was invalid, for the reason that it had been obtained, as was alleged, by false and fraudulent pretenses, and that his title was consequently void. About the time of receiving this notice which, as I have said, was five years after he had purchased and located the warrant and made his improvements, he volunteered as a private soldier in the Army of the United States, and he has been in the Army ever since. It has thus been utterly impossible for him to raise the money necessary to make a fresh entry of the lands, or to buy a new land warrant. He purchased the original land warrant in good faith. It had passed through several hands, and he paid a full price for it. The invalidity of the warrant, if it be invalid, was owing probably to the neglect of the officers of the United States in issuing it originally. The committee have thought that whatever might be the state of the law with regard to the question arising as between Ford and the United States, owing to the peculiar circumstances of his case, he having abandoned his home and family in order to fight the battles of his country, and it being thus out of his power to raise a sufficient sum to pay twice for his lands, and his wife and children being in danger, unless Congress interferes for his relief, of being turned out of their home, while he is in the service of his country, the committee under these circumstances unanimously reported this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire to say a word.

Mr. THAYER. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The case which the gentleman from Pennsylvania states appeals very strongly to the sympathy of the House, but it seems to me that in passing this bill we should be making a very dangerous precedent hereafter.

Now, as I understand the law in relation to the location of land warrants, where a land warrant is located in good faith and it turns out afterwards to be defective, the Land Office, in consideration of that good faith, permits the party to get another land warrant and thus secure his title to the land. It seems from the statement that the gentleman makes that this party would have that right precisely as any other party would have; but the gentleman makes the point that he, being in the military service, is unable to raise the money necessary to replace this defective land warrant.

Now, sir, if it be true that this land is worth $1,200, it seems to me very strange that the money could not be raised to replace this land warrant, which at most would not amount to more than $100. I think this is improper legislation, and I think the House should hesitate to make a precedent in a case like this which will change the rule.

Mr. THAYER. I am not able to appreciate the point made by the gentleman from Illinois. I will, however, correct one statement of fact which he has made. The land warrant which Ford located cost him $200.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not make any point on that. I made the point that land warrants are now worth only about half the minimum price of the public lands—but seventy-five cents an acre, or a little more—and it would therefore cost about one hundred and fifty dollars to replace the defective land warrant which Ford located.

Mr. THAYER. I do not know how much it would cost to replace the warrant which was bought and located in good faith by this soldier, but I do know that he paid $200 in cash for it in 1858, and that in the interval that elapsed between 1858 and 1863, a period of five years, he received no notice whatever affecting his title, and that during that time he made valuable improvements upon the lands which he had located.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Was he not advised that he could, at any time after the discovery that the land warrant which he had located was defective, replace it by another land warrant?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly; I have expressly stated that in 1863, five years after locating his warrant, and after he had expended such money as was at his command in building a house for the shelter of his family and improving a portion of these one hundred and sixty acres—for that is the whole amount in controversy—he was suddenly notified by the Land Office that the warrant under which he had located his land, and which he bought in good faith, was invalid, not by any fault of his, but because, as I maintain, there was laches on the part of the officers of the Government of the United States in issuing a land warrant to a person who was not entitled to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, for I desire to understand this matter. He speaks of laches on the part of officers of the Government in issuing this land warrant. I would like to know in what respect? There is no pretense, I presume, that the land warrant issued by the Government was not a good warrant. It may have been invalid, perhaps, on account of a defective assignment, and if that be the case, if this party bought the warrant with a defective assignment, then the party who sold it to him is responsible for the amount which he paid. If we vote this man his land he not only gets the land, but he recovers from the party of whom he purchased the land warrant the whole amount that he paid for it.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken. It is not owing to any defect in the assignment of the land warrant. It is expressly found by the committee and shown to the committee that the invalidity is owing to the fact that it is alleged by the land officers that the warrant was originally obtained by false and fraudulent pretenses. There is no allegation on the part of anybody that the warrant is not a perfectly good warrant on its face. There is nothing on its face to put anybody on his inquiry about it. It is on its face as good a warrant as any Treasury note issued by the Treasury of the United States is on its face a good Treasury note. It was under such circumstances that the soldier bought the warrant. The assignment was perfectly regular. He had entered the land and had expended the accumulations of his toil upon it. And five years after he had purchased the warrant, thus perfectly good on its face, he is suddenly notified by the Land Office that it was obtained by the original owner from the Land Office by false pretenses. No one, I apprehend, can impute to this man any laches or neglect. No one can say that anybody would not be deceived in purchasing this warrant.

The gentleman from Illinois thinks that this man ought to buy another warrant and locate it. I am disposed to think that perhaps a very nice question of law might arise between the legal title of the United States and the equity of this man. I do not propose now to argue that question. I think that the circumstances of the case are such as appeal to every man in the House. On receiving notice of the invalidity of the warrant he

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1864.

NEW SERIES:—No. 40.

abandoned his home and family and entered the Army as a private soldier. He has been in that service ever since. His farm has been neglected, his family abandoned, and he has found it utterly impossible to raise money enough to purchase another warrant. He has before him the prospect of having to witness his home being taken from him and his wife and children turned out while he is himself engaged in bearing arms in the service of his country.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this man could get his land free under the homestead law, but I am unwilling to put him to that course. The committee thought that, under the circumstances, owing to the peculiar hardship of the case, through the laches of the Government in putting into circulation a warrant which it subsequently alleges was obtained by false pretenses, taking into consideration the good faith of the soldier, the service he is now rendering, and the impossibility of redeeming himself through absence in the Army, I believe the House will feel disposed to pass the bill for his relief.

The question being on the engrossment and third reading of the bill,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for a division.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. WASHBURNE of Illinois, and YEAMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, no 1.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative to make a quorum.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Chair has no right to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a right to vote on every question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Under the rules the Chair has no right to vote unless there be a tie vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have a precedent on the subject read, as he claims the right to vote. The Clerk will read from the note to page 159 of the rules of the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"On a very important question taken December 9, 1803, on an amendment to the Constitution so as to change the form of voting for President and Vice President, which required a vote of two thirds, there appeared 83 in the affirmative and 42 in the negative; it wanted one vote in the affirmative to make the constitutional majority. The Speaker, (Mason,) notwithstanding a prohibition in the rule as it then existed, claimed and obtained his right to vote, and voted in the affirmative; and it was by that vote that the amendment to the Constitution was carried. The right of the Speaker, as a member of the House, to vote on all questions is secured by the Constitution. No act of the House can take it from him when he chooses to exercise it."

The SPEAKER. The Chair chooses to exercise the right in this instance.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the rule of the House be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read rule 7. The rule was read, as follows:

"In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not be required to vote unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal; and in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost."

The SPEAKER. When there is a tie vote or a ballot vote, the Chair can be required to vote; but as the House will observe, on one of the most important questions that can come before the House, a proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States, one of the predecessors of the present occupant of the chair, (Mr. Mason,) claimed the right to vote, and the right was conceded, notwithstanding the prohibitory character of the rule then existing, but which has since been modified as just read. The Chair therefore thinks, although it is not usual to vote except in cases of a tie vote or to make a quorum, that he has the right to do so.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then the Chair disregards the rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the Chair enforces the rule of the House.

The bill was engrossed and read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed; there being, on a division—ayes 90, noes 2.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 2; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. RANDALL of Kentucky and ROSS.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table, the tellers having reported—ayes 114, noes 2.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. CLAY. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be, and he is hereby, instructed to print one hundred thousand additional copies of the annual agricultural report for the year 1863, eighty thousand of which for the use of the members of the House, and twenty thousand for the use of the Agricultural Department.

Resolved further, That the said copies shall be bound with the plates or pictures distributed throughout the volume where the subject-matter is treated of, similar to those heretofore printed and bound for the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] will present and have read to the House a petition which he has received on this subject.

Mr. BEAMAN. It is in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, under the rules, must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLAY. Why?

The SPEAKER. Because it provides for printing of extra numbers of a public document.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. WHALEY. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report the following:

Whereas the space assigned to the Department of Agriculture, in the Patent Office building, included between the central crypt and the west wing, in the first story on the south front, is entirely inadequate to the necessities of the Department—two of the rooms within these limits being used as furnace-rooms for the Patent Office, one as a chemical laboratory, and another having recently been taken for the use of the Land Office—having but five rooms within one small store-room for the business of the Department; and whereas additional rooms are indispensably necessary for the convenience of the Commissioner, for the accommodation of the clerks engaged in the collection and compilation of statistics and in other official duties, for the better accommodation of the operations of the chemist in making agricultural tests, analyses, and experiments, and for the arrangement and exhibition of pomological, entomological, and agricultural specimens, models, and paintings: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the rooms now occupied by the Department of Agriculture there shall be, and hereby is, assigned to the said Department the suite of rooms upon the first floor included between the southwest corner and the western entrance of the Patent Office building.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter, and I hope that it will not be passed without further investigation. As I understand the purpose of Congress in creating the Department of Agriculture, it was not intended that it should grow and increase in magnitude so as to be equal to almost any Department of the Government in point of expenditures. It was created rather for the benefit of agriculture than the employment of a large number of clerks. The appropriation made last year is, I understand, already expended, and there have been additional sums expended without any authority of law whatever. I understand further that the Commissioner of Agriculture has already applied to the Senate for $20,000 as a deficiency.

By looking at the estimates for this year I observe that there are to be two clerks employed solely for the purpose of disbursing the amount to be paid to employes of that Department. On looking at the number I find that those who are permanently employed exceed the number of those employed in the State Department, and that there is a much larger excess in the number of temporary employes. I do not believe that Congress intended so large an outlay. I do not believe it was the purpose of Congress to authorize so expensive an establishment, though no man in this House is a better friend of agriculture and agriculturists than I am. By a simple provision of a few lines creating this Department power was given to employ a chief clerk and a botanist, chemist, and entomologist for such time as their services might be needed. We have now all these permanently employed for each of the purposes indicated. The law only permitted the Commissioner to employ other persons as Congress might from time to time provide, but a draughtsman and translator have been asked for, and many other persons have been employed without the sanction of law. I do not know but all these unlicensed expenditures are necessary, but I believe that it would be wise in Congress to wait until the select committee appointed to investigate certain matters in reference to the Department can have time to report, until that committee can examine whether the moneys we have already appropriated have been wisely and properly expended, and until we know whether the rooms proposed can be set apart without inconvenience to other Departments or not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be referred to the select committee.

Mr. ORTH. The select committee, of which I am chairman, have no power to investigate the expenses of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the previous question.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. WHALEY. We do not upon this joint resolution propose to enter into any discussion on the subject of expenditures. We do not choose to keep that Department in a cramped condition where they have not room, at the present time, to be even comfortable. The Committee on Agriculture will probably have an opportunity hereafter to discuss this question of expenditures. I propose by this resolution, as instructed by the committee, to give them the four additional rooms which they need.

The motion to refer the joint resolution to the select committee was not agreed to.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has the resolution been engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House adjourn; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WILSON. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MALLORY, and Mr. DAVIS of Maryland, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-three, a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazarus, Le Glond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Patterson, Poudleton, Perry, Pike, Prunyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Fernando Wood—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman

Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas F. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Fluck, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClung, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orrin, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander B. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Seefeld, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—75.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is there any question now pending?

The SPEAKER. There is a demand for the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is there anything to prevent proceeding now to the consideration of the enrollment act?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The resolution being engrossed, it was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK called up the consideration of the enrollment bill, and proceeded to correct several errors which occurred in the printing of the substitute offered yesterday by the Committee on Military Affairs, and concluded by calling the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand for a moment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose, from looking over this bill, that there will be no disposition to go over all the amendments which have been made by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union if we can get a vote on those matters in which the substitute and the amendments differ. What I propose is that before the previous question is called we shall be permitted to offer an amendment. I propose that we shall dispense with going over those amendments of the Committee of the Whole, provided the gentleman will allow us to offer an amendment, which I will indicate, and which will make the two conform. If the House reject the amendment I offer, the question will come up as between the substitute and the original bill. If the House adopt or reject my amendment by a fair vote, of course I shall vote for the bill. My proposition is to strike out all after the word "draft," in the sixth section, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "during the time for which the person was drafted, unless the rolls shall sooner be exhausted," so as to make the section conform to the amendment which, by a very large vote, was adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

If the gentleman will allow me to offer that amendment and take a vote upon it, I think we will all agree to take a vote between the substitute and the original bill. I do not ask the gentleman to accept the amendment, but only to let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would not do at all in the shape in which it now stands.

The SPEAKER. Unless by unanimous consent the amendment could not be voted on at this time.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that, and I am therefore asking it.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the various amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I am aware of that, but a vote can be taken on my amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that instead of saying "unless the roll has been previously exhausted," he shall say "unless the names placed in the box for draft shall sooner be exhausted, in which case they shall be returned to the box." If he will modify it in that way I will accept it as part of my substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "draft," in the fifteenth line of the 25th page, which is as follows: "in filling that quota; and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procuration of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year in every such case the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "During the time for which the person is drafted, unless the names placed in the box shall be sooner exhausted, in which case the names shall be returned to the roll;" so that the clause will read:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procuration of a substitute, under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft during the time for which the person is drafted, unless the names placed in the box shall be sooner exhausted, in which case the names shall be returned to the roll.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me that the gentleman should state in his amendment to what time he refers when he speaks of the names being placed in the box.

Mr. STEVENS. Placed in the box for draft.

Mr. GARFIELD. The names are in the box for draft all the while.

Mr. STEVENS. The amendment refers to the names in the box at the time the commutation money is paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it refers to the names in the box at the time the commutation is paid that will do; but if it does not it will not do at all.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman that there are names being put in the boxes all the time, and I suggest that those thus put in and who have never been liable to draft should take their chance of draft before those who have already been liable to draft. I will, however, modify my amendment so as to read:

During the time for which the person was drafted, unless the names placed in the box for draft shall be sooner exhausted, in which case the name of such person shall be returned to the box.

Mr. COPFROTH. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer an amendment to the seventeenth section, for the purpose of calling the yeas and nays upon it, so that gentlemen may face their constituents when they go home and meet the responsibility of rejecting the proposition which I now make.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let us hear it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That the board of examination of enrolled or drafted men are required to hold their examinations in the county town of each county where the inhabitants thereof exceed seven thousand; and the Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the interests of the people will be subserved thereby, to permit or require the board of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examination at one or more points in any county of the enrollment district.

Mr. SCHENCK. That matter was fully considered by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it had been before by the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was settled in the shape in which it now stands. I must, therefore, decline to yield.

Mr. COPFROTH. If the gentleman will yield to me I will make no objection to his bill. What I want is the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I were to do it, there are fifty or more amendments which were offered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and voted down on which gentlemen will want the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the close of the twenty-sixth section of his bill, which is in these words:

The Secretary of War shall appoint a commissioner in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award a just compensation not exceeding $300 to each loyal person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service, who may volunteer into the service of the United States, payable out of the commutation money, upon the master freeing the slave.

I think he will find that there has been a material omission. That last sentence as it now stands makes no sense at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. To whom does the "who" refer? To the loyal master?

Mr. SCHENCK. The section can be amended by striking out the words "who may volunteer into the service of the United States."

Mr. MALLORY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that I think he would save all the trouble if he would strike out the whole section. We will not object to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. That is so comprehensive a modification that I cannot consent to it. I ask my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] whether that will not effect his purpose?

Mr. PENDLETON. I think not; for as the section then stands there is only a provision of $300 for the loyal master, no matter how many of his slaves are taken. The "each" refers to the master, not to the slave. It seems to me that some words ought to be inserted in the seventeenth line to indicate that the payment is to be made for each colored volunteer.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The sentence is very awkward, but perfectly intelligible.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. PENDLETON consulted as to the best language in which to put the section.

Mr. GANSON. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to let me offer the amendment extending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to children.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman must excuse me.

Mr. ELIOT. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Military Committee to section twelve. The words "acting volunteer lieutenant" were inadvertently omitted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to their being added.

The section was amended so as to read:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, acting volunteer lieutenant, acting master, acting ensign, or acting master's mate, having an appointment or acting appointment as such, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the chairman of the committee to modify the twenty-seventh section so as to make it conform to the action of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in the substitution of the words "persons owing service" for the word "slaves."

Mr. SCHENCK. I care little about the word "slave" so long as we understand what the thing is. When I look on the statute-book I find the word "slave" running through it in a thousand cases, because the term of slave was recognized as an existing relation between man and man under the laws of the State, although not under the laws of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now submit the amendment agreed on to the twenty-sixth section. It is to strike out after the words "charged to award" the words "a just compensation not exceeding $300 to each loyal person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to each loyal person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation not exceeding $300 for every such colored volunteer, payable," &c.

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept that modification.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to substitute for the word "slaves" in the clause providing bounty and compensation for those who have heretofore enlisted the words "persons of color." I cannot see why slaves should be put upon a different footing from other colored persons.

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept that amendment. I suppose that such was the intention of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot accept amendments to the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir, but there is a similar provision in the substitute offered by the Military Committee, and the modification is made in that.

Mr. COX. I desire to suggest to my colleague that, owing to the mistakes in the preparation and printing of the bill, and to the confusion existing in the Hall, which prevented us understanding here a word of what has been going on for the last half hour, he should let this bill go over until Monday, so that he may have Saturday and Monday morning to examine it more fully.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would be willing to give a month of time to its consideration if I could, but, as it is, I cannot give an hour.

Mr. COX. I do not ask it on behalf of myself, but on behalf of my colleague.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have been as liberal as possible in this matter. I have taken time, and wasted time, as some may think, in hearing what might be said in the way of suggestion. I propose now to go on and make a few remarks explanatory of the bill, although I believe I should first, according to the rule, move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the twenty-sixth section be modified as was intended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by adding after the word "slave" the words "of a loyal master or owner;" so that it will read:

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master or owner shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person owes service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States, on freeing the person.

Mr. SCHENCK. That was the intention of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I accept the modification.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to offer an amendment to the twenty-sixth section?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will hear what it is.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That in no one State shall there be recruited more than three fifths of the able-bodied men of African descent in said State. All those who have already or may hereafter enlist or be drafted into the military service of the United States shall be credited to that State and district from which they may be taken or recruited, and where they may owe service.

Mr. CLAY. I just want to place it on the Federal basis.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot accept any such amendment. That whole subject was gone into in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that we are anxious on this side of the House that something should be said on this bill before it shall be put on its passage. We do not want to have any long debate; two or three speeches on this side of the House will satisfy us, and then we will be willing to vote upon it. My colleague just before me [Mr. HARDING] desires to speak upon the bill, and one or two others I believe desire to be heard. I hope the gentleman will afford that opportunity.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot open this bill to debate again. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to every gentleman who desires printing his speech.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate to the House that nothing which can be said except by himself will enlighten the House upon the subject of this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir, I have no such confidence in myself as that. But, sir, I believe it to be our bounden duty to pass this bill as soon as possible. I believe that the interests of the country demand that we dispose of the measure before us as soon as under the circumstances we can, and I therefore now demand the previous question.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. The gentleman will remember that at a late period last night an entirely new section was introduced upon which there has been no discussion at all.

Mr. SCHENCK. On the contrary, that subject has been more fully discussed than any other in connection with this bill. It began the previous evening, and continued all day yesterday.

Mr. HARDING. It has not been discussed at all. It was not brought up until a very late period last evening.

Mr. SCHENCK. I differ with the gentleman upon that point. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 78, noes 56.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose now, briefly, to run over the provisions of this bill. I understand that by the rules I am entitled to an hour from the ordering of the main question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman's hour to commence when he began to modify the substitute. The gentleman has twenty-three minutes left.

Mr. MALLORY. Let the gentleman from Ohio print his speech. We will not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I would if it related to anything except the real practical question in hand.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to ask the consent of the House for permission to extend his remarks?

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh no, sir; I will go on. Mr. Speaker, the first three or four sections of the House bill are precisely like the Senate bill, with the exception that in the House bill the words "precincts" and "election districts" are inserted, in order to conform it to the political divisions in the several States; and that being the case I shall pass on to the remaining differences between the two bills.

I desire, however, at the outset, to make this general remark: I would gladly occupy an hour of the time of the House in some observations, more at large than I shall now have an opportunity to present them, upon the subject of a draft as a means of raising troops for the protection of the country and the putting down of the rebellion; but, as the House will bear me witness, from the beginning I have desired that the whole discussion and consideration of this bill and its merits should be confined as far as possible to a business debate and a business consideration.

I will now take up the amendments in the order in which they have been made in Committee of the Whole and reported to the House. On pages 3 and 4 the committee report that section five be stricken out of the Senate bill, and a substitute inserted. The history of that amendment is simply this: the original section was amended by the committee in two or three particulars, one of which was on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to strike out "$400" and insert "$300." Several other amendments were proposed and adopted, when on motion of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] seconded by a majority of the Military Committee, the whole section as amended was stricken out, and section six of the House bill inserted. The motion was then made to amend that substitute by striking out the last sentence from the eleventh line, which motion prevailed. And this House section, or the section proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, was adopted as a substitute for the Senate section thus curtailed of its proportions.

In the House-proposed substitute we have restored the latter part of section five, now section six. This morning it has been modified to suit the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and those who agree with him. No further comment is necessary, then, for we coincide in opinion.

So far as the other amendment is concerned, we have put it in a form agreeable to the friends of the bill.

Section six of the Senate bill was entirely stricken out, partly because it provided for double credits, partly because the second sentence was included in another part, and because from line nine was deemed entirely unnecessary. Upon that we shall have no vote to take.

Section seven was also struck out, for the reason that the section is simply a reenactment, almost in words, of the existing law. We shall have no vote to take upon that.

Section eight has been modified by an amendment at the end of page 6. The same amendment will be found embodied in the substitute. That will be found upon pages 23 and 24.

Section nine has been amended by adding what is printed upon page 7:

And any person now in the military service of the United States who shall furnish satisfactory proof that he is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman, may enlist into the Navy under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War: Provided, That such enlistment shall not be for less than the unexpired term of his military service nor for less than one year: And provided, That the numbers so transferred shall not exceed ten thousand: Provided, That any bounty money which a seaman may have received on entering the Army shall, on his being transferred to the Navy, be deducted from any prize money to which such seaman may become entitled.

That very section will be found in the substitute, page 27, section nine, with some slight difference of phraseology. I ask gentlemen to refer to it.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That any mariner or able seaman who shall be drafted under the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," shall have the right, within eight days after the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman, and a certificate that he has so enlisted being made out in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost-marshal of the district in which such mariner or able seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officer issuing the same that the said person so enlisting in the Navy is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman. And any person now in the military service of the United States who shall furnish satisfactory proof that he is a mariner by vocation or an able seaman, may enlist into the Navy under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War: Provided, That such enlistment shall not be for less than the unexpired term of his military service nor for less than one year. And the bounty money which any mariner or seaman enlisting from the Army into the Navy may have received from the United States, or from the State in which he enlisted in the Army, shall be deducted from the prize money to which he may become entitled during the time required to complete his military service: And provided further, That the whole number of such transfer enlistments shall not exceed ten thousand.

Gentlemen will see at once in what the change consists.

Section ten of the substitute will be found on pages 27 and 28, the same as the section in the Senate bill, with the exception of the words "precinct or election district," which are inserted.

The same is true with regard to section eleven.

Section twelve is the same as that of the substitute, with this addition, upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE:] "Strike out the words in brackets and insert the words in italics:"

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, [or other person,] acting master, acting ensign, or acting master's mate, having an appointment or acting appointment, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment [and forming one of a ship's complement.]

Section thirteen of the Senate bill, on page 9, has a corresponding section, section twenty-eight in the substitute, with the five or six unnecessary lines at the commencement left out.

Upon page 10 will be found section fourteen. By referring to page 29 of the House bill you will find section fourteen, containing the same matter, with the exception of the amendment. That amendment printed in italics in connection with the Senate bill, will be found in the House bill, page 30, section seventeen. Instead of being attached to section fourteen it is attached to a section to which it properly belongs, as far as subject-matter is concerned. Section fifteen has been struck out, and section fifteen of the House amendment has been substituted. That will also be found still in the House bill. The same with section sixteen. There are two sections seventeen, I find, printed in the Senate bill—another error—except that the latter part of that section, page 14, which was one of the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, and which reads as follows—

Provided, That in all districts over one hundred miles in extent, and in such as are composed of over ten counties, the board shall hold their sessions in at least two places in such districts, at such points as are best calculated to accommodate the people thereof. The drafted men shall have process to bring in witnesses, but without fees or mileage—has been inserted in the House bill on page 31 at the end of section seventeen, a section to which it more properly belongs from its subject-matter. Section eighteen of the Senate bill will be found in section nineteen of the substitute on page 31, the same as it is there. Section nineteen of the Senate bill will be found the same as it has been amended upon page 25, section seven, of the House bill. The amendment consists of the proposition made by the gentleman from Maryland, to be found on page 15, beginning at line fourteen, and is as follows:

And provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this section unless his declaration of conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be supported by satisfactory evidence that his deportment has been uniformly consistent with such declaration.

That language is still preserved, as we considered the action of the Committee of the Whole an instruction to the Military Committee upon that subject. On page 15, section twenty will be found to correspond with section eighteen of the substitute. On page 16, section twenty-one will be found corresponding so far as the first sentence is concerned and down to line eight, with section twenty of the House amendment.

The remainder of that section, beginning in line eight, and printed in italics, will be found in section twenty-one, page 33, of the substitute. The language has been preserved, and has only been transferred to the section to which its subject-matter allies it. On page 32 will be found section twenty-one of the House bill, which is the same as section twenty-two of the Senate bill, found at page 16. Section twenty-three of the Senate bill corresponds to section twenty-two of the House bill upon page 33. Section twenty-four of the Senate bill has been amended. The substance of that section and the section itself, indeed, will be found in section twenty-four of the House bill, on page 34, excepting that instead of being exactly like the bill of the Senate it contains the amendment to be found on page 17, at the foot of the page. Section twenty-five corresponds with section twenty-five of the House substitute. Section twenty-six of Senate bill corresponds with section twenty-three of the House substitute. Section twenty-seven of the Senate has been amended, and that amendment is embodied, with the rest of that section, in section twenty-six of the House amendment. Section twenty-eight, on page 20, corresponds with section twenty-seven on page 36 of the House bill.

Now I come to a section to which I wish to call the particular attention of the House. Section twenty-nine is a section printed here in the Senate bill as an amendment made by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and yet, as I distinctly recollect—and I have refreshed my recollection by consultation with other members—it was not adopted by the Committee of the Whole. That amendment, which constitutes now in the Senate bill section twenty-nine, is not to be found in the House substitute. According to my recollection it was rejected when it was offered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Section thirty, on page 21, will be found constituting a part of section four in the House bill, the same in matter and almost the same in words. On page 21 the matter which constitutes section thirty-one will be found in the House substitute at the end of section twenty-six, page 36.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having gone through, item by item, with these amendments, I have only this general remark to make, that by the modification of the House substitute which has been made this morning, upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the great and leading difference in principle between the two bills has been obviated. If that modification had not been made there would have been upon one of the points connecting itself with the consideration of the fifth section of this bill a wide difference between the House substitute and the Senate bill. The House substitute looks to the returning of the names of parties drafted to the roll or to the wheel to be drawn again whenever those previously in the wheel subject to draft shall have had their names taken out. The Senate bill, as amended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] contemplates the purchasing of exemption for $300 by all persons, to extend over the whole period of three years. Here is a radical difference which would, perhaps, have occasioned some struggle between the friends of the substitute and of the Senate bill had that difference remained. I am glad that by the modification made this morning we have been enabled to reconcile as between the friends of the enrollment act this difference, and that the House substitute as it now stands amended is in such form as to be equally acceptable to the gentleman who made this amendment to the Senate bill and those who reported the bill and have hitherto been sustaining it in the form given to it by the Military Committee of the House. If, therefore, the Senate bill shall be amended by the substitute of the House all these differences cease.

Those, however, who are in favor of allowing drafted men to buy exemption for the full term of three years and of leaving the principle of exemption to stand precisely where it does now, without returning the names of drafted men to the wheel rendering them liable to be drawn again when the original draft has exhausted all those in the wheel, will vote against the House substitute and stand by the bill of the Senate as originally amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

I think it proper that I should state this thus distinctly in order that all may understand what is the issue. I repeat that those who are for permitting all persons subject to draft to buy exemption for three years and to have their names taken entirely from the roll will vote against the House substitute; while those who desire such a modification of the law as that the names shall be returned to the roll and put again into the box when one draft shall have exhausted all the names placed there—thus keeping up a continuous enrollment and draft and preventing men from buying off their time so as to cripple the means and resources of the Government—will vote for the House substitute. The issue is now thus fairly made between the friends of the House substitute, the friends of this more stringent process by which to effect the obtaining of men for the Army, and that looser system which now prevails and which we have sought to amend.

That issue having been fairly made, I am disposed to leave it to the decision of the House. Having promised to confine my remarks to such as should be purely of a business character, and such as should relate to an explanation of the bill and of the substitute which I propose for it, I have nothing further to add excepting to ask the friends of the Government on both sides of the House—those who are in favor of providing the means of enabling the Government of this country to put down a wicked and causeless rebellion—to stand by the bill in the shape in which it is now placed, and to pass it, and pass it speedily, in order that the armies of the Union may be reinforced, the Union thus sustained, and—

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague will be allowed to proceed with his remarks, with the understanding that he will then allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] to be heard for the same length of time.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. I should have liked an opportunity to conclude my sentence, but I shall open no door for debate. The House will bear me witness that I have not troubled it with any extended remarks.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ARNOLD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if he wants to have separate votes on all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the Senate bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. That will be for the House to determine.

Mr. HARDING. I would inquire whether the vote must not first be taken on the substitute?

The SPEAKER. Under the parliamentary law the House must first vote on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the Senate bill.

Mr. HARDING (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MALLORY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARDING and ELIOT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 21, noes 86.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion. I am informed by gentlemen on the other side that all that they require is that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] shall be allowed to speak half an hour in reference to the section of the bill introduced last evening. They say they will then proceed to the regular taking of the question on the amendments, and that they will not interpose dilatory motions. If that be so I ask that by unanimous consent the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed half an hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is entirely out of order, and I call my colleague to order.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will the chairman of the committee permit me to make a single remark?

Mr. MALLORY. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The call comes rather late. The result has been announced.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I move an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be en-tained, as no business has been done since the same motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HARDING. I intended calling for the yeas and nays on the adjournment, and was immediately interrupted by this conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky may have intended it, but he certainly did not do so. The Chair announced that the noes had it.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means give me his attention one moment? I desire to say to him that I, for one, am entirely disinclined to engage in any of this filibustering. I have not engaged in debate on this question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to debate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I submit that business has been transacted since the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. No business has been transacted.

Mr. MALLORY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that a motion to adjourn cannot be entertained, as no business has intervened since the same motion was rejected. From that decision the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. MALLORY. I call for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. Have I not the right to state the ground on which I appeal? I take this point of order, that I rose to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rose, and by unanimous consent was allowed to make a proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was called to order.

Mr. MALLORY. Consent was given, and the gentleman made his proposition. Immediately after that failed to meet the assent of the House I called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. These remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, by unanimous consent, were not business in the sense of the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is the very thing the Chair decided, [laughter,] that they were not. The Chair will restate his decision. After the vote by tellers on the motion to adjourn it was reported that there were 21 votes in the affirmative and 86 in the negative. The Chair decided that the noes had it. Then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rose and asked unanimous consent to be heard, and went on with his remarks. Consent to his proposition was refused. Then the gentleman from Kentucky demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. The Chair decided that the call came too late. Then a motion to adjourn was made, and the Speaker having refused to entertain it, the gentleman from Kentucky appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. HARDING. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order, no business having intervened since it was rejected.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The House has already fixed the time to which it shall adjourn.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over to Monday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Al-ley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Brandergee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chauler, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Morrison, Amos Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—107.

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Eliot, Frank, Gooch, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Smithers, Thayer, Upson, and Van Valkenburgh—39.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and on a count there were—ayes 32, noes 76.

Mr. WADSWORTH demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WADSWORTH and BAXTER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 14, noes 72; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for a count of the House.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not required on a motion to adjourn. The lack of a quorum, however, suspends all other business.

Mr. BEAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, James S. Brown, English, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, Noble, Pendleton, James S. Rollins, and Sweat—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. I ask for leave of absence until Monday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays on granting leave to my colleague.

Fourteen members voted for and 89 against ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WADSWORTH and WINDOM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported twenty-five in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLAY then withdrew his request for leave of absence.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to strike it out and insert in lieu of it a substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. Before the question is taken on the substitute for that section, I ask if there are not amendments to the original section to be voted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee of the Whole reported but a single amendment, to strike out and insert. When the motion prevailed to strike out the section and insert other matter in place of that stricken out, the amendments inserted in the original section fell with the original section itself.

Mr. STEVENS. How will it stand if the substitute is rejected? Will it not stand then as it was amended in committee before striking out?

The SPEAKER. The original section of the Senate bill will remain without amendment; all the amendments made to it in committee having fallen when it was stricken out and a substitute inserted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 82.

Mr. ASHLEY called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James H. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—87.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, stated that Mr. FENTON had paired upon all questions in reference to the conscription bill with Mr. PERRY.

Mr. PERRY. I understood that I was only paired on the main question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state that I only announced, as I was requested to do, the statement to me of the gentleman from New York. I supposed this was the main question, as a vote in the affirmative is a vote directly to kill the bill.

Mr. PERRY. As there may possibly be some misunderstanding in reference to the matter I will withdraw my vote. If Mr. FENTON were here he would vote in the negative and I in the affirmative.

Mr. FRANK stated that Mr. A. W. CLARK was confined to his room, and had paired with Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, is there not a rule requiring gentlemen to vote?

The SPEAKER. There is a rule requiring members to vote.

Mr. GRINNELL. I observe several members on the other side in their seats refusing to vote on this, the important military bill of the session.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were agreed to en masse, with the exception of the following, on which a separate vote was asked:

Twenty-second amendment:

Strike out the following:

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent or prohibit the enlistment of men in the States in rebellion under the orders of the War Department.

And in lieu thereof insert:

All able bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years of age, whether citizen or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal citizen shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof. The bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person owes service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States, on freeing the person. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award a just compensation, not exceeding $300, to each loyal person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service, who may volunteer into the service of the United States, payable out of the commutation money upon the master freeing the slave.

Mr. MALLORY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask for a division of the amendment—of the part that provides for a draft from that which provides for compensation.

The SPEAKER. It is one amendment as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and cannot be divided.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Cobb, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—83.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—67.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. ARNOLD said: Believing that the Government in its necessity has a right to the service of every able-bodied man without regard to color, and that such right supersedes all claim to service, either for years or for life, under the laws of any State, I am in favor of enrolling all men without regard to color. Not recognizing any claim to service under the laws of any State as a valid exemption from the draft, I am opposed to making compensation for such claim to service, especially unless given to parents whose sons are taken without compensation. I am for the enrollment and against the compensation. I vote "ay."

Mr. COLE, of California. I voted "no" because I cannot consent to pay the bounty to the pretended owner of the negro and not to the negro himself who fights.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have voted for compensation on condition that the whole family of the colored soldier shall also be entitled to freedom.

Mr. WILSON stated that he was opposed to compensation, but that under the rule he was constrained to vote for the proposition as a whole as an amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Messrs. JULIAN, ORTH, ASHLEY, and ALLISON made the same statement.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, stated that he would have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment, in each congressional district, to cause lists of the names of each and every person enrolled under the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is amendatory, to be printed, arranging alphabetically each and every name of such person in the township or ward in which he resides; and that at least ten copies of such list of names of the persons enrolled in any township or ward be posted in public places in such township or ward; and that five printed copies of the full lists, in each and every county, be deposited for public inspection in the office of the county clerk, or of the proper custodian of the county records of such county.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that that amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward U. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upton, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—81.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where slaves have been heretofore enlisted in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable, as well as to those who may be hereafter recruited.

Mr. UPSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurred on the following substitute:

Strike out all after the first section, and insert the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the quota of each ward of a city, town, township, precinct, or election district, or of a county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, shall be, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the number of men resident therein subject to draft, taking into account, as far as practicable, the number which has been previously furnished therefrom; and in ascertaining and filling said quota there shall be taken into account the number of men who have heretofore entered the naval service of the United States, and whose names are borne upon the enrollment lists as already returned to the office of the Provost Marshal General of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the quota from any State shall not be filled within the time designated by the President, the provost marshal of the district within which any ward of a city, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, which is deficient in its quota, is situated, shall, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, make a draft for the number deficient therefrom; but all volunteers who may enlist after the draft shall have been ordered, and before it shall be actually made, shall be deducted from the number ordered to be drafted in such ward, town, township, precinct, election district, or county. And if the quota of any district shall not be filled by the draft made in accordance with the provisions of this act and the act to which it is an amendment, further drafts shall be made and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person enrolled under the provisions of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish, at any time previous to the draft, an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft, nor at the time in the military or naval service of the United States, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall be exempt from draft, not, however, exceeding the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted. But no private soldier, musician, or non-commissioned officer being actually in the military service of the United States shall be procured or accepted as a substitute.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons liable to draft under the provisions of this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of twenty years before the draft; all aliens who shall declare their intention to become citizens; all persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States who have not been in such service two years during the present war; and all persons who have been exempted under the provisions of the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, but who are not exempted by the provisions of this act; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft all persons who, between the time of the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the names of such persons from the enrollment.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance for duty at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. If such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall be liable to draft in filling future quotas. And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft during the time for which the person was drafted unless the names placed in the box for draft shall be sooner exhausted, in which case the name of such person shall be returned to the box.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That members of religious denominations who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers: And provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this section unless his declaration of conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be supported by satisfactory evidence that his department has been uniformly consistent with such declaration.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth shall, on account of alienage, be exempted from enrollment or draft under the provisions of this act, or the act to which it is an amendment, who has at any time assumed the rights of a citizen by voting at any election held under authority of the laws of any State or Territory, or of the United States, or who has held any office under such laws or any of them; but the fact that any such person of foreign birth has voted or held, or shall vote or hold, office as aforesaid, shall be taken as conclusive evidence that he is not entitled to exemption from military service on account of alienage.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any mariner or able seaman who shall be drafted under this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, shall have the right, within eight days after the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman, and a certificate that he has so enlisted being made out in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost marshal of the district in which such mariner or able seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officer issuing the same that the said person so enlisting in the Navy is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman. And any person now in the military service of the United States who shall furnish satisfactory proof that he is a mariner by vocation or an able seaman, may enlist into the Navy under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War: Provided, That such enlistment shall not be for less than the unexpired term of his military service nor for less than one year. And the bounty money which any mariner or seaman enlisting from the Army into the Navy may have received from the United States, or from the State in which he enlisted in the Army, shall be deducted from the prize money to which he may become entitled during the time required to complete his military service: And provided further, That the whole number of such transfer enlistments shall not exceed ten thousand.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever any such mariner or able seaman shall have been exempted from such draft into the military service by such enlistment into the naval service, under such due certificate thereof, the ward, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, from which such person has been drafted, shall be credited upon its quota to all intents and purposes as if he had been duly mustered in the military service under such draft.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service or marine corps that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited to the ward, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, acting volunteer lieutenant, acting master, acting ensign, or acting master's mate, having an appointment or acting appointment as such, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from enrollment and draft under the provisions of this act and of the act to which this is an amendment, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft, and all persons who have served in the military or naval service two years during the present war and been honorably discharged therefrom. And no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act shall be consolidated.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed or aiding in making such enrollment, or employed or aiding in the performance of any service relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy, or deserter from, or in the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court; but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability under proper indictment or process for any crime against the laws of a State committed by him while violating the provisions of this section.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall detail or appoint such number of additional surgeons for temporary duty in the examination of persons drafted into the military service, in any district, as may be necessary to secure the prompt examination of all such persons, and to fix the compensation to be paid to surgeons so appointed while actually employed. And such surgeons, so detailed or appointed, shall perform the same duties as the surgeon of the board of enrollment, except that they shall not be permitted to vote or sit with the board of enrollment.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, to permit or require boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examinations at different points within their respective enrollment districts, to be determined by him. Provided, That in all districts over one hundred miles in extent, and in such as are composed of over ten counties, the board shall hold their sessions in at least two places in such district, and at such points as are best calculated to accommodate the people thereof.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses in behalf of the Government, and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees, in any case pending before them or either of them; and the fees allowed for witnesses attending under summons shall be six cents per mile for mileage, counting one way; and no other fees or costs shall be allowed under the provisions of this section; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations. And any person who shall wilfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, or member thereof acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, wilfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months. The drafted men shall have process to bring in witnesses, but without mileage.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That copies of any record of a provost marshal or board of enrollment, or of any part thereof, certified by the provost marshal, or a majority of said board of enrollment, shall be deemed and taken as evidence in any civil or military court in like manner as the original record: Provided, That if any person shall knowingly certify any false copy or copies of such record, to be used in any civil or military court, he shall be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That all claims to exemption shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party claiming exemption to the truth of the facts stated, unless it shall satisfactorily appear to the board of enrollment that such party is for some good and sufficient reason unable to make at present such oath or affirmation; and the testimony of any other party filed in support of a claim to exemption shall also be made upon oath or affirmation.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That if any person, drafted and liable to render military service, shall procure a decision of the board of enrollment in his favor upon a claim to exemption by any fraud or false representation practiced by himself or by his procurement, such decision or exemption shall be of no effect, and the person exempted, or in whose favor the decision may be made, shall be deemed a deserter, and may be arrested, tried by court-martial, and punished as such, and shall be held to service for the full term for which he was drafted, reckoning from the time of his arrest: Provided, That the Secretary of War may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge, when it shall appear, upon due proof, that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians: And provided further, That such persons, their parents or guardians, shall first repay to the Government and to the State and local authorities all bounties and advance pay which may have been paid to them, anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall procure, or attempt to procure, a false report from the surgeon of the board of enrollment concerning the physical condition of any drafted person, or a decision in favor of such person by the board of enrollment upon a claim to exemption, knowing the same to be false, shall, upon conviction in any district or circuit court of the United States, be punished by imprisonment for the period for which the party was drafted.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That the fifteenth section of the act to which this is amendatory be so amended that it will read as follows: That any surgeon charged with the duty of such inspection, who shall receive from any person whomsoever any money or other valuable thing, or agree, directly or indirectly, to receive the same to his own or another's use, for making an imperfect inspection, or a false or incorrect report, or who shall wilfully neglect to make a faithful inspection and true report, and each member of the board of enrollment who shall wilfully agree to the discharge from service of any drafted person who is not legally and properly entitled to such discharge, shall be tried by a court martial, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not less than $500 and not more than $10,000, shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and be cashiered and dismissed the service.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, shall not, in any case, exceed five dollars; and physicians or surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft shall not be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act; and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability; and any officer, clerk, or deputy connected with the board of enrollment who shall receive compensation from any drafted man for any services, or obtaining the performance of such service required from any member of said board by the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered upon information or indictment before any court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt, one half for the use of any informer who may prosecute for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States, and shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That no member of the board of enrollment, and no surgeon detailed or employed to assist the board of enrollment, and no clerk, assistant, or employe of any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, directly or indirectly, be engaged in procuring or attempting to procure substitutes for persons drafted, or liable to be drafted, into the military service of the United States. And if any member of a board of enrollment, or any such surgeon, clerk, assistant, or employe, shall procure, or attempt to procure, a substitute for any person drafted, or liable to be drafted, as aforesaid, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and pay a fine not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, by any court having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person owes service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States, on freeing the person. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commissioner in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the commutation money, upon the master freeing the slave. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted in the military service of the United States all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable, as well as to those who may be hereafter recruited.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, and also so much of said act as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

No. 114) to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848, and further to preserve the purity of elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise by a registration of electors for the city of Washington in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THANKS TO GENERAL W. T. SHERMAN.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 30) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. They also direct me to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It declares that the thanks of Congress and of the people of the United States are due and are tendered to Major General W. T. Sherman, commander of the department and army of the Tennessee, and the officers and soldiers who served under him, for their gallant and arduous services in marching to the relief of the army of the Cumberland, and for their gallantry and heroism in the battle of Chattanooga, which contributed in a great degree to the success of our arms in that glorious victory.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 95) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States. It will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States, to allow him pay as a commander from the 16th of July, 1862, in the same way and manner as if the order discharging him from the naval service had never been issued.

Mr. HALE. There is a report accompanying the bill, which is very short. Let that be read, and I shall have nothing more to say.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, from which it appeared that the petitioner alleges that being an officer in the Navy on the 5th of August, 1862, he was promoted, to his present rank, to date from the 16th day of the preceding July; that the Senate, on the 21st of the then next February, confirmed him as such commander. He further alleges that while he was on duty, on the 12th of October, 1862, he received official notice by a letter from the Navy Department, dated September 20, 1862, that he was dismissed from the naval service; and that he remained in that situation until he was, on the 21st of February, 1863, confirmed as commander by the Senate on a nomination of the President made on the 12th of the same month. Under these circumstances, he prays that he may be allowed pay as commander afloat from the 16th of July, 1862, to the 12th of October in the same year, and of a commander waiting orders from the latter date to the 21st of February, 1863, when he was confirmed in his present office by the Senate. The facts alleged in the petition the committee find on reference to the official records of the Government to be true. The nomination of Commander Preble, made by the President on the 12th of February, 1863, to take rank from the 16th of July previous, the precise time from which his former appointment was to date, and its subsequent confirmation by the Senate on the 21st of the same month, in the opinion of the committee, had the effect, and was manifestly intended to have the effect, of putting him precisely where he would have been if the order of the Navy Department of September 20, 1862, discharging him from the naval service, had never been issued, and must be considered and taken to be a full revocation of that order, and a condonation of any real or supposed offense or delinquency on his part subsequent to the period from which his commission was to entitle him to take rank. Under these circumstances, the committee were of opinion that the prayer of the petitioner is just and reasonable, and ought to be granted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of the soldiers of the United States Army. I hope we shall be able to dispose of it in a short time.

Mr. HOWE. That will lead to debate. Let us get through with the business of the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON. I have given way to the business of the morning hour for three days, and I will not do it any longer. Insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CONNESS in line nine after the word "service," to strike out the words "during the whole time in which they shall be or shall have been in such service," and to insert, "from and after the passage of this act;" so that the resolution will read:

That all persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay, and emoluments, other than bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service, from and after the passage of this act; and that every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

Mr. CONNESS. Is there not another amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER?]

Mr. SUMNER. No. My amendment is at this moment but a proposition to amend just so soon as it may be in order. It is not in order to offer my amendment while the amendment of the Senator is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from California, and that is now the question before the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. On that subject I have but a few words now to say. I need not say that in offering this amendment I was not governed by any desire to do injustice to any portion of our people who are engaged in the service of the United States or under the orders of the War Department. I believe fully that every man employed as a soldier, without reference to color, should be paid the compensation that is provided by law for his rank and position; but it occurred to me, as there was a considerable difference of opinion, owing to the question of whether we should pay all the soldiers thus employed under other forms of contract for the period of time during which they were engaged in the service, that an amendment of this kind would meet the case and do no injustice to any portion of the soldiers of the country. I find, however, a considerable difference of opinion growing out of the amendment that I have proposed. I find that to some extent there has been an understanding with a portion of these colored men that they should receive full compensation, or that all efforts would be made to procure it for them, and that their enlistment was induced by those promises of full compensation. Let it should be the medium of injustice to any of those men, I wish now, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw the amendment I offered, as I am told that an amendment about to be proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] will cover the entire case. If it does I shall support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No action having been taken on the amendment moved by the Senator from California, it is competent for the mover to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer an amendment in the nature of a proviso, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, With regard to all past services, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that such persons at the time of being mustered into the service of the United States were led to suppose that in fact they were enlisted under the act of Congress approved July 22, 1861, as volunteers in the army of the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think that covers the case. I think there were a number of these men—I know it was so in my State—who were led to suppose that they would have the same pay as the white soldiers as soon as Congress assembled; that the manifest injustice of paying white soldiers one price and colored soldiers another price would be at once corrected. I do not say that that statement was made to them by the authority of the War Department. They had not that authority; but the statements were made to them by those who induced them to enlist, and who, they had reason to suppose, would be able to effect the relief desired. I think where it shall appear that the persons who enlisted them or the State authorities gave them to understand that they would have this additional pay, they ought to have it. I do not think we ought to hold them to the strict letter of the law.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think those who were enlisted years ago for ten dollars a month and never expected any more ought to have ten dollars a month; but I think those who have enlisted since that time and were promised, whether by the War Department or by the State authorities, that they should have thirteen dollars a month ought to have thirteen dollars. That is a clear obligation it seems to me.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, for instance, here are certain facts that have come to my knowledge since this matter was under discussion the other day. The day before yesterday I was called into the lobby by two paymasters from Louisiana who assured me that there were four colored regiments there, excellent soldiers, who were enlisted in pursuance of a handbill posted about the streets, purporting to bear the signature of General Ullman and offering thirteen dollars a month. They assured me that when they came to pay those soldiers and it appeared that the pay was only ten dollars, the soldiers felt pained and mortified, and they complained of their treatment as an outrage. The paymasters then paid them at the rate of $6 50 a month and entered it in pencil on their rolls, adding "on account." At the same time they gave the soldiers to understand that unquestionably at some future day they would be authorized to make a full payment of thirteen dollars a month for their services as soldiers. That is the case in Louisiana, and it seems a very strong case.

But the case in Massachusetts is much stronger. Since this subject was under discussion the other day I have received from Governor Andrew a copy of the enlistment papers—I have them here—which were actually signed by the Massachusetts fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments, and also the company papers that were signed by their officers. The enlistment roll with the printed caption signed by these soldiers of African descent is as follows:

UNITED STATES VOLUNTEER ENLISTMENT LIST.

We the undersigned, by our signatures hereto annexed, do severally agree to serve for a period of three years from the date of our being mustered into the United States service, unless sooner discharged, as volunteers from Massachusetts in the force authorized by an act of Congress of the United States, approved on the 22d day of July, A. D. 1861, entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," in accordance with the provisions of said act and other acts in addition thereto.

Mr. ANTHONY. What was the date of that?

Mr. SUMNER. It was in the month of March, 1863.

I hold in my hand a printed duplicate of the actual paper subscribed by these soldiers. It is plain and positive. I am at a loss to see how there can be any question with regard to it. I submit also that the case in Louisiana is clear. I understand also that the case of the soldiers of African descent enlisted in South Carolina is equally clear. They also entered into the service understanding that they should be paid thirteen dollars a month under the act of 1861; and I think the troops to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers would fall in the same class.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will make his amendment to include also all those who enlisted after the date of the act of March, 1863, it would cover the case. I think those enlisted after that time, although they might not have signed the same paper, and did not in fact, had the same understanding.

Mr. SUMNER. But let me remind the Senator that there have been large enlistments of colored troops in Tennessee. Does the Senator know on what terms?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not. It is this case that from the beginning has seemed to me to be the only difficulty in the solution of this question. We know nothing of the terms on which those enlistments in Tennessee were made. The Senator will remember that they were made on a large scale by the patriotic services of General Thomas, the Adjutant General of the Army of the United States. If they were actually at the rate of ten dollars a month I do not propose on any ground of sentiment, by retroactive legislation, to burden the Treasury with thirteen dollars a month. I propose to treat this question in a practical way, and to try to carry out the contract of the United States—contract I call it—express or implied, made by agents of the United States, rightfully or wrongfully, but made under such circumstances that, it seems to me, the honor of our country is pledged.

Now, sir, I do not wish to trouble the Senate further. The whole subject was considered amply the other day, on grounds of sentiment and on grounds of law. I content myself now with a simple statement of the case, and the expression of an earnest hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment without debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps the Senator from

Massachusetts is not more willing than I should be to pay these soldiers the same amount of compensation that we give to white soldiers. But there is involved in this measure a principle which I think is quite dangerous, and will be in its practical operation in future. The law itself—at least I assume that to be the true construction of the law, and it is upon that construction that the particular motion which is now contemplated is based—did not authorize any such promise as was made to these soldiers.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. The law as it stood at that time—I mean the law under which they were enlisted—did not authorize any such promise as is said to have been made to these soldiers.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator just there?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. On that the Senator understands there is a difference of opinion. The Governor of Massachusetts most sincerely interprets the statute of 1861 as authorizing the enlistment of persons of African descent as volunteers.

Mr. GRIMES. And entitled to thirteen dollars a month?

Mr. SUMNER. And entitled to thirteen dollars a month. He has stated that in his message; he has argued it; and I take the liberty of saying here I have seen no answer to it; and I do not see how it can be answered. I merely venture to interpose this suggestion at this particular moment, as the Senator from Maryland was observing that these soldiers were not enlisted under the statute of 1861.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not mean to particularize any statute, nor did I mean to say what in my opinion is the meaning of the act of 1861, or either of the other acts on this subject, nor whether the construction put upon the law by the Executive of Massachusetts is the correct one or not. It is sufficient, however, for my purpose to say that if the Governor of Massachusetts is right, and these men because of the law under which they are enlisted are entitled to thirteen dollars a month, the Treasury will pay them and there is no necessity for any legislation; but the very object of this legislation, the very necessity for the proposed law is that the Executive Departments of the Government do not so construe the law. They therefore are of opinion—and upon that opinion I act—that, under the law as it stands, these soldiers are not entitled to more than ten dollars a month; and it is proposed now to get rid of that difficulty, not by an amendatory act to operate in the future, but by an act declaring that, whatever may have been the law before, or assuming that the law before would not entitle the soldier to more than his ten dollars, he is to have his thirteen dollars from the day of his enlistment. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to put it upon the ground, which is generally true, that where the agent of a principal in the execution of his agency makes a promise, that promise is as binding upon the principal as it would be if made by the principal himself. But that does not apply to a public agent. If it did, the Treasury of the United States would soon become bankrupt. The rule on the subject is very familiar, and nobody can be better acquainted with it than the member from Massachusetts, that whoever deals with a public agent, who is executing a duty devolved on him by the authority of an act of Congress, is supposed to know and bound to know the extent of that authority, and if he thinks proper to trust to any representation made by the agent which the agent had no power to make, his only redress is in a proceeding against the agent. Otherwise, as I stated just now, the United States would be in a very unpleasant predicament, particularly at this time. In Massachusetts, for example—I do not state it as having occurred, for I am sure it has not occurred; I have confidence in the integrity of Governor Andrew; perhaps he is a little wild upon a particular subject, but that wildness is not confined to the Governor of Massachusetts—

Mr. SUMNER. "Wise" the Senator meant.

Mr. JOHNSON. "Wild" I said. He may be a little "wise." I think he is certainly wild. But so far as the question is concerned it is very probable—I speak only of the Governor as I am sure I might be spoken of myself—it is very probable that the Governor of Massachusetts was induced to put his construction upon that act because he thought such ought to be the law and wished that such should be the law. Now, I have in my possession a letter received from one hundred and forty-two soldiers belonging to the fourteenth regiment of New York, in which they state this to have occurred, and they make a very strong case of it if their facts are true: that when they were mustered into the service they were told by the recruiting officer and by the mustering officer that they were to be discharged from the service at the same date that the regiment in which they were to be enlisted was to be discharged under its enlistment; that is to say, at the end of two years, the regiment to which they were attached having already served one year. They with the original members of the regiment were to go at the expiration of two years. There is no doubt that they were so told, and they came into the service of the United States under what they believed to be a rightful pledge made to them in behalf of the Government. They come here to the Department, or I went there for them, and I was told—and I have no doubt the Department act right—that they could not recognize any such pledge as that; if made at all, it was made without the authority of the Department, and it is a matter that the soldier is bound to know in advance before he enters upon the service what is in point of law the obligation which he is about to contract with the Government.

Now, Mr. President, the honorable member from Rhode Island tells us, and I have no doubt it is true, that some of these men were told that they were to get thirteen dollars a month. Told by whom? Told by the man who enlisted them. Who was he? You give two dollars a man to every person who will enlist a soldier, and with a certain description of men two dollars is very apt to make them believe they have an authority which they have not got, and to make statements by which they will be able to make their two dollars, but nobody pretends, as I understand, that there was any assurance given by the War Department to any one of these soldiers that upon coming into the service of the United States they were to be paid any more than ten dollars a month.

In my view, therefore, there is no obligation, either legal or moral, upon the Government to pay these men more than the law entitles them to. If Senators think the Treasury of the United States at this time is in a condition to give away eight or nine hundred thousand or a million dollars; I do not know how much it will come to; there are differences of opinion in relation to the amount involved in it—

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion on that point?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand that the discretion given to the Secretary of War by the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will permit of such a loose application as the Senator from Maryland describes. I ask the Senator if he has paid attention to the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I heard it. The amendment provides only—I do not give its exact words—that the Secretary of War is to be satisfied that some assurance was made to these men that they were to get the same pay as white troops.

Mr. SUMNER. The language is "that they were led to suppose."

Mr. JOHNSON. "Led to suppose." By whom? By anybody; and all that would be required by the Secretary would be to get an affidavit from some man that these soldiers were told that they were to get thirteen dollars a month. He does not sit as a court, with testimony on both sides, and bring the witness before him and ask him how he came to give any assurance.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us, and I believe he has written evidence of it, that General Ullman, who commands a brigade of the Corps d'Afrique in Louisiana, made that assurance. That may be true; but I cannot help doubting it, because I know General Ullman is a lawyer, and a very good lawyer, and I take for granted he knew what the law was, and if he did not know what the law was I also take it for granted that he would not have so far forgotten his duty as to induce those men to go into service by promising them thirteen dollars a month when he knew they could only get ten dollars. If he did it he ought to be no longer in the command of that brigade, because, according to my view of conduct of that description, he would be a dishonor to his cloth. There may be and will be sent to the Department, in all human probability, for we all know how easy those affidavits are procured, affidavit after affidavit that General Ullman was heard to make this promise.

Mr. SUMNER. There is the handbill signed by him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, a handbill. How issued? Under what authority issued? Who believed it when issued? I do not think the practical effect as to the amount to be paid out, if you pass the joint resolution without the amendments suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, will be at all affected by the adoption of the amendment. That honorable member says that he deals with this as a practical question; that with him it is not a matter of sentiment in this particular instance. He has some little sentiment on the general subject; he seems to have studied that con amore; I do not blame him for it. But he says he deals with this question as a practical question. That is true; he does deal with it very practically, for he takes out of the Treasury $800,000, or whatever may be the amount of it. That is being practical with a vengeance! The true way as I think to deal with it is, throwing sentiment aside, which the honorable member says he has done—he will permit me to say that he would have been more accurate if he were to say that he thinks he has done it—throwing all sentiment aside, let us ask are these soldiers entitled to this money? If they are, in God's name give it. If they are not, then give it to them if you think the Treasury is in a condition to part with eight or nine hundred thousand dollars for nothing.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very evident to my mind that this matter is compromised by attempting to cover some individual cases in a general law. It may be the case, and no doubt it is so, that there have been individual instances of hardship, or would be if we passed the bill as it now stands, and should not pass some subsequent act for the relief of those particular regiments. I think, however, that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had better not involve this bill with any reference to the Massachusetts regiments or to the Rhode Island men who have been enlisted or to the South Carolina regiments. Let us agree by this bill that from this time forth every man who is in our employment as a soldier, no matter what may be his color, shall be entitled to the same pay; and then, if it is necessary to pass some special legislation to cover the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments, or to apply it to the regiments in South Carolina, let the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs introduce a bill for that purpose, and call it up, and if it contains merit I for one will vote for it. But I do not think this bill ought to be retrospective.

We shall have accomplished a great deal when we shall have accomplished as much as this bill proposes; and that is to give to colored soldiers the same pay, and authorize the President to give them the same bounties that are given to white soldiers. I trust the chairman of the committee will see that the policy which I have suggested is the best one, to withdraw that part of the bill which makes it retrospective; and then if we want a retrospective bill applied to particular cases let us pass it afterwards.

Mr. HOWE. I rise simply to assent to the advice just given by the Senator from Iowa. It seems to me it is eminently sensible. I take it you cannot, by a general bill, undertake to do justice to a great variety of special cases. We do not know upon what facts they rest. It does seem to me that the Senator from Massachusetts, in urging the propriety of making this bill retrospective, has put it upon the right ground; and that is that there is a legal right vested in at least some portion of the colored troops which have been mustered into the service of the United States to receive thirteen dollars a month. If the fact is so we cannot take away that right; nor can we by any action of ours strengthen it; and it strikes me that if the fact is not so it would be dangerous to undertake, after these troops have been paid and the rolls have been returned to the office of the Paymaster General, to reopen these accounts and to put the Treasury of the United States in the hands of all these paymasters and authorize them to go into the country and readjust and settle the services rendered by these troops. I think it would be very dangerous indeed.

But it seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken upon the question of law. When he read the other day the order issued by the War Department, under which it was said certain regiments in Massachusetts had been recruited, I was inclined to think he was entirely right in supposing that at the time that order was issued there was no law which distinguished between the pay to be made to colored soldiers and the pay made to white soldiers; and I was inclined to think he was right, and I still think he was right in saying that there was no law then which prohibited Governor Andrew from enlisting colored troops. I always thought there never should have been such a law. I always thought they should be employed wherever they could be had just as freely as persons of any other color. I understand, however, this morning that in point of fact these troops were not enlisted at that time, nor under the laws then existing; that they were not enlisted until after the law of 1862 was passed, which did discriminate between colored and white troops, both as to the pay they were to receive, and as to the services they were to render. It did not put colored troops upon the footing of soldiers. It was a qualified kind of service that that act contemplated, and it was a modified pay that it provided for. So that upon the question of law I think the Senator is mistaken in assuming that there is any legal right vested in these men by any previous legislation of ours to receive more than ten dollars a month.

Upon the question of justice, it is said that assurances have been held out by different parties, some acting as the agents of the different States, some acting as agents of the United States, none speaking in the name of the law; that they have given assurances here and there that a rate of pay should be allowed which the law did not warrant, and it is assumed that that creates a sort of equity in favor of these troops which we are bound to recognize. Now, I wish to state one single individual instance showing what is the action to the Government in such cases. I know a man who was in the employ of the Government of the United States, under the authority of an Indian agent, acting as blacksmith for a tribe of Indians, and receiving a pay of forty dollars a month. When the second regiment of cavalry was raised in Wisconsin he was urgently solicited by an officer who was recruiting for one of the companies to enlist in his company. He assured him that he would be put on extra work, and would be entitled to the same pay he was then getting, to wit, forty dollars a month, for extra service. The man had some doubt about it. The officer assured him that the fact was so, and to make him more certain he took him to Milwaukee where the regiment was then in camp, the regiment being commanded by Colonel, now Major General Washburn. Colonel Washburn looking at the law and at the regulations saw that for extra services blacksmiths were entitled to receive forty dollars a month. He overlooked the fact that the act under which those regiments were raised authorized the enlistment of blacksmiths at, I think, fifteen or sixteen dollars a month. He thought that the way to secure him forty dollars a month was to enlist him as a blacksmith. Accordingly the man was enlisted as a blacksmith, and sent into service. The paymaster said at once he could only receive the pay allowed to blacksmiths by the act, and he could not receive the pay due for extra services. That soldier is to-day in the second regiment of Wisconsin cavalry, having given up a situation under the Government in which he was getting forty dollars a month, and he is doing duty for, I think, fifteen dollars a month, if that is the rate of pay allowed to blacksmiths.

Upon the evidence of the officer who enlisted this man and upon the certificate of the colonel of the regiment stating these facts I applied to the War Department either to give him the forty dollars a month which it was expressly stipulated he should have, or to discharge him from the regiment. It was referred to the general-in-chief. The general decided that he enlisted in due form and they could not discharge him; and they could not pay him forty dollars a month, because there was no law authorizing it; that if any officer acting in the name of the United States or on behalf of the United States promised to pay him more than the law authorized, the officer must make it good to him, the Government would not.

That is the rule of action had in reference to an individual, and upon just the facts I state. Now are we prepared to say that we shall hold the Treasury of the United States responsible for all the assurances and all the guarantees and all the promises that all the persons in the employment of the Government see fit to make?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday comes up as the special order of the day, and by positive rule of the Senate is now before the body for consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the consideration of all other subjects, for the purpose of going on with this joint resolution. I think we can finish it soon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that the special order will be merely laid aside informally for the present until the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has charge of the bill which is the special order, shall come in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent of the Senate the special order may be postponed for the time being. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. If we are to stand strictly on the law, of course we can do nothing in this case; I mean if we stand on the construction of the law which holds that these men were raised under the act of 1862, instead of the act of 1861. Some of these regiments certainly have been raised with the promise of their officers and of general officers that they should have the same pay as other troops. I hold in my hand a letter from Colonel Higginson, commanding the first South Carolina regiment, in which he gives an extract from the order of General Saxton raising that regiment, which says: "The persons to be received into the service and their officers to be entitled to receive the same pay and rations as are allowed by law to volunteers in the service." From the 1st day of October, 1862, to the 28th day of February, 1863, the men of this regiment received thirteen dollars a month; now it has been reduced to ten dollars, and in reality they are paid only seven dollars, as I explained the other day. What is said of this regiment applies to Colonel Montgomery's regiment and to some other regiments, which were paid thirteen dollars a month for a time and then were cut down to ten dollars. The Government has not only done that, but it proposes to go back and deduct the excess over ten dollars which they were paid in the past.

It is evident to my mind, however, after what has been said here this morning, that this joint resolution is delayed by this attempt to do justice to some ten or fifteen or twenty regiments to whom this promise was made. I think the amendment proposed by my colleague would not apply to more than fifteen or twenty regiments at most, and it would be at the discretion of the Secretary of War. I should be perfectly willing to trust it in his hands. But as I see that I cannot get the resolution through promptly in its present shape, I propose to amend it by striking out that portion which makes it retrospective, by striking out all after the word "service" in the ninth line down to the word "and" in the tenth line, and inserting "from the 1st day of January, 1864," so that it will read "as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service from and after the 1st day of January, 1864."

I propose this so as to make the law begin to operate from the commencement of this year. It may be that the resolution may not get through Congress for the next two months; it may be held up in the other House; and the gross injustice of allowing these men to remain in the service performing the same duty as other men without the same compensation is apparent, I think, to every body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of his colleague, or as an amendment to the body of the joint resolution?

Mr. WILSON. To the body of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is not yet in order. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in the form of a proviso.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know whether the Senator from Massachusetts who offered that amendment as a proviso withdraws it, or whether he desires a vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not resist the request of my colleague, the chairman of the Military Committee, who has this bill in charge, but I cannot withdraw the amendment without expressing my regret that the course of this debate seems to render such a measure at all advisable; nor can I withdraw it without making one word of reply to some of the suggestions that have fallen from Senators.

The Senator from Maryland, with that felicity which enters into all of his arguments, has given a glowing picture of what would ensue from this simple act of justice. He says there would be a very large draft upon the Treasury. He talks about hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now, sir, I have no reason to suppose that there will be any such draft. I believe that if my proposition be adopted the draft will be very small. The proposition will be applicable to only a few regiments. My colleague says some fifteen regiments; I doubt whether to so many as fifteen. I therefore put aside all that eloquent portion of the Senator's remarks. There is to be no draft on the Treasury which the Treasury cannot bear easily, and, when I consider the nature of our obligations, I would almost say gratefully.

The Senator went further on grounds of law, and he said that there was no legal obligation. I am aware that the Secretary of War is of the same opinion, for if there were a legal obligation recognized at the Department under his charge there would be no occasion for any discussion in this Chamber. But there are persons who differ from the Secretary on that question. I do not wish to obtrude my own opinion upon it, but I have no hesitation in declaring just as confidently as the Senator—

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; I did not.

Mr. SUMNER. That there is a legal obligation.

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him whether under this act of 22d July, 1861, there is not a fair and certain test by which to determine the question? The act reads: "The President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept the services of volunteers, either as cavalry, infantry, or artillery, in such numbers," &c. Now, the question I put is whether he has accepted these regiments under this act. If he has, then I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. If he has not, then I think there is no question about it.

Mr. SUMNER. The answer to the inquiry of the Senator is very easy. I do not wish to go over the ground discussed here to-day; but the Senator will remember that the order of the War Department which I read made no allusion to any statute under which they were to be enlisted, but it called for volunteers, "including" persons of African descent. Such were the terms of the order under which Governor Andrew acted. The Governor read the statute. He is a good lawyer. In his opinion he was authorized under the statute of 1861 to enlist colored troops. He finds no "color" in that statute. But the Senator asks, have they been accepted?

Mr. COWAN. Did he offer them, and were they accepted? Because if he did, then they were within the terms of this statute, and we should be obliged to pay them.

Mr. SUMNER. The answer to that is this: that they were mustered into the service as the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments of the Massachusetts volunteers; that they have been accepted as such; that as such they have been passed to the credit of Massachusetts; also that at the time of their enlistment Governor Andrew assured them that they were volunteers in the service of the United States, enlisted under the statute of 1861; and still further that, in point of fact, the enlistment papers which they signed, and according to which they were mustered into the national service, expressly declared that they were enlisted under this statute. If this be not acceptance practically, I know not what can be acceptance.

Mr. COWAN. Then we ought to pay for them. Mr. SUMNER. I say, therefore, we ought to pay for them; and this brings me round again to the point of law raised by the Senator from Maryland. I have no hesitation in saying that on strictness of law we are obliged to pay those good soldiers thirteen dollars a month; but I am reminded that there is a difference of opinion on this obligation. There are learned Senators in this Chamber who, as the question of law, adopt the conclusion of the War Department. How, then, shall we proceed in order to regulate this matter? Admitting that there is a difference on the point of legal obligation, it seems to me reasonable and just that, discarding this question for the moment, we should, by a careful consideration of facts, endeavor to arrive at a proper conclusion on principles of justice which unhappily sometimes differs from law.

And this again brings us to the terms of these enlistments. Forget, if you please, the obligation of law—although for myself I cannot forget it—forget whether the War Department or Governor Andrew is right in their respective interpretation of the acts of Congress, I ask you to consider candidly under what statutes and by what terms these enlistments were actually made, or at least the soldiers supposed they were made.

I have already read to the Senate the actual enlistment papers of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments. You do not forget the terms. What follows? Why, sir, clearly this: that in conscience the Government is bound to treat them as soldiers under the statute of 1861, and to pay them accordingly. Now, I plead before the Senate that the Government shall do what in conscience it is bound to do. Our present delay is mischievous. This discussion is painful.

But the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] says that it would be better to bring forward a distinct measure providing for these different regiments. Why, sir, would he have the Senate undertake to audit all these claims? and this it must practically do if by a distinct measure it undertakes to decide upon them. I think the Senator will not find any such proposition practical. The proposition now before the Senate is more practical; if the Senator from Maryland will pardon me for using the word. It proposes to refer the whole matter to the discretion of the Secretary of War. He has the means of instituting the proper inquiries. He can ascertain better than anybody else, better than anybody in this Chamber, under what terms these soldiers were actually enlisted, and if to his satisfaction it shall appear that, in point of fact, when they took service they supposed that they were soldiers under the statute of 1861, then it will be his duty to pay them accordingly.

Now, sir, I am unwilling to occupy too much of the time of an enlightened Senate; but it seems to me I should do injustice to the case of these brave and well-deserving soldiers if I did not at least state it plainly and urge it as earnestly as I can. In my opinion, if you set their claim aside now you sacrifice them; you do an act of injustice. I know Senators do not intend to do any such act; but I cannot doubt that such will be the consequence of the vote of the Senate. And I do not think that at this time the national Government can afford to do an act which shall have so much as a semblance of injustice toward those colored troops who are shedding their blood for our cause.

Sir, I am unwilling to withdraw the proposition. I shall do it if my colleague desires it. At any rate, I should rather, for my own satisfaction, have a vote upon it. If the Senate choose to reject it I shall at least have the satisfaction of having done my duty.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make a motion which ought to be made now. The Committee on Finance have been further looking into the deficiency bill which was under consideration yesterday; and we have had some more deficiencies coming in for our consideration this morning which perhaps require immediate attention; and inasmuch as the specifications of deficiencies that we had from the War Department yesterday may be interesting to the Senate, and members may like to see them, and I propose to have the bill go over until Monday. I ask that they may be printed. I should like to have them printed so that we may have them on our tables on Monday morning. I shall not call up the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent the motion of the Senator from Maine will be entertained, and the papers presented by him will be printed; and the deficiency appropriation bill, if the Chair understood the motion of the Senator from Maine, will be postponed until Monday next. That order will be made, if no objection be interposed. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 116) in relation to university lands in Washington Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 179) concerning lands in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 228) confirming the title of Joseph Ford to certain lands in Rice county, in the State of Minnesota; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT BILL.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill and amendment were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 116) in relation to university lands in Washington Territory—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 179) concerning lands in the State of California—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 228) confirming the title of Joseph Ford to certain lands in Rice county, in the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) to grant additional rooms to the Agricultural Department—to the Committee on Agriculture.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise for the purpose of setting myself right in the view of the honorable member from Massachusetts, as well as of the Senate itself. The Senator from Massachusetts understood me as saying that the construction put upon the act of 1861 by the War Department is the correct construction. I have not said a word about that act. I have not looked into the act of 1861.

Mr. SUMNER. I understood the Senator to assume that. I know that the Senator did not go into any statement of his own opinion on that point.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not examined it, but I act upon that assumption from what is presented here.

Now, a word or two more. The member from Massachusetts tells us that there will be no heavy draft upon the Treasury by the passage of this bill, because the effect of the proviso will apply to but a portion of these regiments, six, or seven, or ten, or whatever may be the number; that therefore the sum taken from the Treasury will be comparatively very small. If the amendment should prevail and become a law, all that will be paid will be the amount due to those particular regiments. I suppose it will be one or two hundred thousand dollars at least.

The regiments that have been recruited in Maryland, and those that have been recruited in Ohio, or in Tennessee, or anywhere else, had no such assurance held out to them, and they can get nothing under the provisions of your contemplated law. Suppose they come here afterwards, or suppose that we the representatives of these several States rise up after you have passed this law and say, If your colored men ought to receive thirteen dollars a month because they were told so, ought not our men to receive it? Are they not risking their lives and shedding their blood in defense of the country, fighting for the same object, running the same peril? Why will you pay Massachusetts soldiers thirteen dollars a month and pay Maryland and Ohio and Kentucky soldiers only ten dollars a month? The reason that would be given in such a case is that, as far as those regiments were concerned, the Governor of Massachusetts told them they were to get thirteen dollars a month, and the regiments raised in other States to be provided for by this bill were told by somebody—the Lord only knows who—that they would get thirteen dollars a month. They are to get this money; but our people who knew what the law was, and who were not dishonest in representing it to be what it was not—I do not mean by that to include the Governor of Massachusetts; I have no doubt he was under the impression under which he has acted—because our people have not held out such representations, our men are not to be paid the money. I should say, in point of justice, in point (if my friend from Massachusetts prefers it) of sentiment, the moment his troops get thirteen dollars a month, why ought not ours to get thirteen dollars a month? How is he going to resist it? Not by saying that the black man in Maryland is not as good as the black man in Massachusetts; because the theory of my honorable friend from Massachusetts is that the black man everywhere is just as good as the white man.

Mr. SUMNER. All men are born free and equal.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, and just as good as the white man. He has not gone, I believe, to the extent of stating it in a different form of expression by saying that the white man is no better than the negro.

Now, if our black men are as good as his black men, why should they not get this money? I should insist upon it, if the Treasury would bear the infliction, that if you pay the colored soldiers of Massachusetts thirteen dollars a month, those of Maryland must be paid thirteen dollars a month, and those of Ohio and of Tennessee must be paid, so that it shall operate in favor of all, and then it will take out of the Treasury eight or nine hundred thousand dollars, or, as I understand, a million or a million and a half.

My friend from Massachusetts is not accomplishing his object by this amendment. He is not getting at the justice which he says belongs to the case. He says, and he supports by his opinion the opinion antecedently expressed by his Governor, that under the act of 1861 these men are entitled to it, and that they are in the service under that act. That is his view of it; and he considers it disreputable to the United States after these men have come into the service of the United States and have been acting on this promise of thirteen dollars a month, on any technical ground to refuse to give it. If it be true that they are in under the act of 1861, upon what ground of morality—if he will permit me so to put the question—is it that he undertakes to distinguish in favor of his men from our men, when our men are all, if his men are, under the act of 1861?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not understand that all are under the act of 1861. I understand some come in under the act of 1861 and some under the act of 1862.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were all mustered under the act of 1862. They are all just as much under the act of 1861 as any portion of them, except we admit that because certain of them are told, without authority, that they are to come in under the act of 1861 they are in under that act. That was not the construction given by the Department.

Mr. GRIMES. Their muster-roll was dated March 3, 1863.

Mr. JOHNSON. They all come in the same way. The honorable member from Massachusetts does not distinguish, as I think, with the accuracy and perspicuity that generally characterizes him, the facts of the case in their application to the law. They are in under the act of 1861, or they are not. If they are in under the act of 1861, and it is clear they are in, then they ought all to be paid. If they are in under the act of 1861, and they cannot be paid under that act, because the Secretary of War is not sufficiently astute to see that that act covers their case, pass a resolution telling him that the act does cover the case and that he must pay them. But that would take eight or nine hundred thousand dollars out of the Treasury and would provide for all, and that would be presenting a case which, according to the reply just made by the honorable member from Massachusetts, is rather startling in the present condition of the finances.

If they come in under the act of 1861 why should they not be paid as the white men are being paid and give them bounties and all, and instead of being eight or nine hundred thousand dollars, you will establish a precedent by which you will be equally bound to give them millions and millions; and all for what? They are in the service now; good soldiers. They are not to become better because you pay them for what they have done in the past. You propose to pay them in the future the same as white troops. I am for that, and I would have paid them in the beginning the same as white soldiers if I had supposed we could not get them for a smaller sum. I would not have paid the white man as much as he is getting now provided you could raise the soldiers for a smaller bounty and smaller pay. The mere pay is nothing. In the contingency that the poor fellows lose their lives fighting the battles of the country, or are worn down and die by disease contracted in that service, the pay is literally nothing. You offer them pay to induce them to come in, and you give them only what will induce them to come in, and you provide for their families afterwards by a pension.

But you have not done that in relation to the negroes. The Treasury could not bear it. It was not necessary, and the exigencies of the country did not demand it. There is a point beyond which we cannot go. The Secretary of the Treasury clearly intimates so. The chairman of the Committee on Finance and every member of that committee tells us so, and every man of them cautions you you had better be careful and husband your resources to meet the necessary demands of the great exigency in which the country is placed. It is no trifling matter, as it seems to me, to pay out of the Treasury upon the ground of any supposed morality, or upon the ground of any sentiment, if that is the ground on which the application is made, some eight or nine hundred thousand dollars. If the Governor of Massachusetts has made a promise which the law did not authorize; if he has created as between the Massachusetts soldiers and the Governor of Massachusetts an obligation which ought to be redeemed, let Massachusetts redeem it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have done it. They have passed a law to redeem it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then why pay it twice?

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I understand the statement, those regiments refuse to receive it from Massachusetts. Was not that the statement?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Your money is about as good as ours, I should think, if not a little better, if you pay in your bank notes.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The Legislature of Massachusetts assembled a few days after the call for three hundred thousand men last autumn, and passed an act authorizing the payment to these colored regiments that were in the field of the difference between the pay of the Federal Government and that which was promised them. I think it was the difference. At any rate they authorized a payment to those troops. The fifty-fourth regiment left Massachusetts the latter part of May last, and they have not been paid at all. They have never received a dollar as yet. The other regiment followed a short time afterwards. Those two regiments declined to receive the extra pay from the State on the ground that when they were enlisted they understood they were to receive the same compensation that was paid to other troops: that they enlisted under that expectation; and that they held the Government to the pledges made, or else they should be discharged from the service, as was their right. They have declined to receive their pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are gentlemen of most extraordinary sensibility. That is all I have to say. We are told they want the money, and Massachusetts tells them, "Our Governor has told you you are to get the money; the Government of the United States, says he, had no authority to tell you any such thing; but Massachusetts is willing to pay you;" and my friend from Massachusetts tells us that these colored gentlemen in their excessive sensibility and their determination to stand upon their rights refused to receive the money from Massachusetts.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand they refused to receive the three dollars a month that was voted by Massachusetts in addition to their pay. I believe they have not received the pay of ten dollars a month either.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have been offered the ten dollars a month, but they will not receive that.

Mr. COLLAMER. They will not receive the three dollars from the State or the ten dollars from the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. Without saying anything particularly unkind of that description of soldiers, I will say, if they are made up of that material they will not be as good soldiers as we hope the others will be, because they have not common sense.

Mr. WILSON. They have made their record on that point.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean in the future.

Mr. GRIMES. It was under the persuasion of their officers that they refused to receive their pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know men of that class better than either of the honorable Senators from Massachusetts. I have been brought up among them. They are docile, very easily persuaded; they believe almost anything, and I can imagine—I imagine it only for the sake of argument—that the colonel or the captains and other officers of these Massachusetts regiments said to them, "Boys, the Government of the United States is bound to pay you; don't let poor Massachusetts be paying you out of her treasury;" and they persuaded them to suffer for the want of the money rather than take it from Massachusetts, who is willing to pay them this amount of money. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] seems to suppose, at any rate he expresses that opinion, that a great deal of injustice is going to be done if the suggestion made by his colleague from Massachusetts shall be adopted. I am willing for myself, as I happened to suggest that amendment or something tantamount to it to the chairman of the Military Committee, to compare my record with that of his colleague on the subject of paying these troops. From the very outset my colleague from Iowa and myself have been in favor of arming negroes. We believed from the beginning of this war that it was not only the right of the Government to do it, but it was the duty of the Government to do it. We have insisted from the beginning that they should be paid and put upon a perfect equality with white men; and nobody knows that better than the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I know it.

Mr. GRIMES. Whether his colleague, who now accuses me of trying to perpetrate an injustice to these colored men, entertained that opinion or not, the country and the Senate do not know.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg to say that it arises, then, simply from my obscurity, because the Senator has not read what I said.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator is not on record on that subject. He did not give expression to his sentiments in regard to it when the subject was under consideration. I did.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. It is very well known that in a public speech long before that I urged this very policy, and I made use of this remark. I venture to quote it now simply in reply to the Senator. I said this: "It is sometimes said that this war ought to be carried into Africa. There is something better: carry Africa into the war." I said that in a public speech in the month of September, I think it was, 1861.

Mr. GRIMES. The difference, however, between the Senator and myself was that I was willing to carry the war into Africa with a bounty and pay of thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. SUMNER. So was I always.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator, I think, does not stand on the record as being in favor of carrying it there, except at the rate of ten dollars a month. I only allude to that in answer to the charge which the Senator has hurled at me of attempting to perpetrate an injustice because I want these colored people to be paid under a special bill applicable to their particular case, if they are to be paid at all.

I know perfectly well that if this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted it will take millions of dollars out of our Treasury. We have heard a great many statements made here in regard to the number of colored troops now in public employment. Sometimes it has been stated at thirty thousand, and sometimes at fifty thousand; I undertake to say there are to-day not far from seventy thousand. I have seen this morning and last night a gentleman from Tennessee, one of the most gallant officers in the public service, who tells me there are exceeding thirty of these regiments in the State of Tennessee alone. Now I should like to know what answer there is to the argument that has been made by the member from Maryland. If we are going to pay the men who enlisted into the public service from Rhode Island and Massachusetts or from South Carolina, why shall we not pay these men in Tennessee? Does the Senator suppose that if his amendment is adopted there will not spring up all around through Tennessee men who have been in our Army, and who have been recruiting these men, who will insist and many of them will be ready to swear that they did represent to these men that they were hereafter to be paid as white men were, at the rate of thirteen dollars a month? If there are any such statements made as that, if these recruiting agents will come forward and so state, or if other parties besides the recruiting agent will make affidavit to that effect, then the Treasury is to be depleted just to the extent that they may swear to that fact.

Suppose the bill passes with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. You pay one regiment in the department of South Carolina thirteen dollars a month. You pay another regiment that is brigaded with it only ten dollars a month. What kind of justice will those men who receive only ten dollars a month think is meted out to them? Do you suppose that is not going to demoralize your Army? Do you not suppose that that is going to create even more difficulty than exists in it at present? I apprehend that you could not pass an act that would be so well calculated to create trouble and difficulty and demoralization in the Army as this very proposition which the Senator from Massachusetts seeks to have adopted.

Mr. President, I sympathize a great deal with those gallant and patriotic noble young men who have gone out in command of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments, and who are in command of the first and second South Carolina regiments. I know a great many of them. I know them to be gallant and patriotic young men. But I cannot help thinking that they have involved us unnecessarily in trouble in connection with this subject; for I know perfectly well that it was through their persuasions these colored troops in South Carolina declined to receive the money that Massachusetts voted to pay them. They seem to think that if we do not make this bill retrospective we thereby cast some reproach on them and their commands, while they ought to remember that the real question is, not what the country or Congress thought of colored troops twelve months ago or twelve years ago or twelve days ago, but what does Congress think of them now. Are we willing at this moment to put them upon an equality as soldiers with white men? That is making great progress; that is an advance in the right direction; and with that, it seems to me, they ought to be satisfied.

As I said before, sir, the only way that I can see that we can get out of the labyrinths of difficulty in which this question is involved is to declare, as has been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that from a given day, say the 1st of January or the 1st of February, all persons of African descent in the military service of the United States shall be paid thirteen dollars a month; and then, if there are any particular regiments or any particular members of regiments who would be entitled to a greater pay for their past services than ten dollars a month, no man in this Senate or in the country would be more willing to render the most ample and complete justice to them than I would be; but I cannot conceive that I am doing any injustice to these men by voting for the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am so anxious to have a vote on this joint resolution that I shall not detain the Senate but a moment in making any remarks upon it. My own judgment is that it would have been a wise thing in the Congress of the United States when it assembled to have promptly passed this joint resolution, or a bill like it, and made it retrospective, and paid all the colored troops that have been raised the same compensation. Senators see a difficulty in that, and my colleague offers a proposition which will cover perhaps somewhere from twelve to twenty regiments that were enlisted by orders from the War Department, which the Governor of Massachusetts supposed authorized him to promise this pay, or by orders of General Saxton, or General Ullman, or other officers. There is difference of opinion in regard to this subject. It is said that the amendment proposed by my colleague cannot be worked out. I shall vote for it as the best proposition that we can get; but if it fails, as I have no doubt it will fail, from the expressions made in the Senate, I shall move the amendment I have indicated, fixing a day when the payment of this increased pay shall commence.

I certainly feel that there ought to be no radical difference of opinion between my colleague and the Senator from Iowa. They have both from the beginning comprehended this rebellion, understood its cause, and advocated the proper remedies. If their opinions had been the opinions of the Senate and the House of Representatives, of the President and his Cabinet, and had been sustained by the country, I believe this rebellion would have been crushed long ago, and the cause of all this trouble and misery ground to atoms.

I hope, sir, that we shall be able to get a vote on this amendment, unless my colleague thinks proper to withdraw it. I leave the matter in his hands without advice.

Mr. COWAN. I do not see very well how this question can arise here in the Senate on this bill. These men are serving the United States under a contract, I suppose. That contract was made by the War Department, and, whatever it is, of course that Department is bound to carry it out. It is alleged by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that they were offered by the Governor of Massachusetts and accepted under the act of 1861. If that be true, then of course they should be paid as all other soldiers who were offered and accepted under that act were paid. Of that I think there cannot be a doubt, because by that act there was no distinction made as to color between black and white volunteers. The black was considered a citizen; or at least all over the Union he was three-fifths of a citizen. As such he owed allegiance to the Government, and as such he was bound to render military service to it. If, therefore, any State organized them into regiments and offered them to the General Government, and they were accepted, they were accepted under the general terms of the act, and they would be paid as other soldiers are paid under that act.

But I understand the General Government have decided otherwise. They say that these men were not offered by the Governor of Massachusetts under the act of 1861; that they were not accepted by the Government under that act; but they were employed by the Government under the act of July 17, 1862; and that act fixes their wages at ten dollars a month. If that be true, then the Government is bound to pay them ten dollars, and no more; and it makes no kind of difference as to what was said to them at the time of that enlistment by Governor Andrew or by anybody else. If they relied upon outside promises and outside assurances of that kind that they would get thirteen dollars a month, and the law only allowed them ten dollars, that was their own folly and the wickedness of the men who offered it in fraud of their ignorance and simplicity.

Still, sir, there are cases where I would be willing to give equity to men who had been imposed upon by officers of the General Government under circumstances of that kind; but this is not that case. It is very well known to every Senator here that there are men who have been serving in our armies now for two years and a half, sun-browned veterans of almost a hundred battles. Those men went into the service without such bounties as are now offered to the eleven-hour men who are coming in. If we are to relax the law, if we are to open up the contracts made by the Government with these colored men and go back and readjust our accounts with them upon the principles of exact equity, then, sir, I am for going back first to the white man and doing him equal and exact justice. If anybody is to be rectified and placed upon an equal and exact footing with the rest, it is the man who was our first and our earliest volunteer, the man who has borne the heat and burden of the day; and I will not agree to override the law and override the decisions of the Executive Departments in order to do justice to these negro troops until, in the first place, equal and exact justice has been done to the white men who have been serving us longer and still more faithfully and at still greater sacrifices than the negro troops have done.

I do not wish to detract from the services of anybody or of any class of our soldiery; but I think the only safe way that remains for us now is to stand strictly upon the letter of our contracts with these men; and then, when the hour of success comes, when the war is over, when the country is restored to its wonted prosperity, we shall be able to go back and do justice to all in proportion to the services they have rendered; but that we should do it now, in the condition of the country and in the condition of the Treasury, I think is exceedingly dangerous; and I, for one, am opposed to it.

I have only to say further, that if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will fix the 1st of this month as the time when this increase of pay shall commence, I will vote for his amendment. I have no objection to go back for a few days; but I do not want to go back for a month or more in order to rectify what may be supposed to be a difficulty in this case, for fear it will open the door to a clamor to go back and rectify as to half a million of other men. If he will fix it on the 1st day of February I will vote for his proposition. I am perfectly willing that from henceforth every man who carries a musket in the service of the country, no matter who he may be, if the country accepts his services, shall be paid equally with any other soldier who carries a musket. I have always looked upon this question as one for the Executive to determine. The negro is either to be a soldier or he is not to be a soldier. That the Commander-in-Chief of our armies must decide. If he can control and discipline him and subject him to the rules and regulations of civilized war, he is just as much a soldier as anybody else; certainly he is as much a citizen as anybody else in this country; and if so, he should be paid the same as the others. But that is not the question that is before us here. We are asked to go back and to grant him rather equity than law. To that I am opposed at this time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have listened with much interest to the remarks of gentlemen on various sides of this question. I shall entirely confine my remarks, which will be very short, to this proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand him to say that he has the form of the enlistment which was used by these colored regiments raised in Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it on my desk.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have looked at it. An enlistment in writing is always signed by the soldiers. The written enlistment which the Senator from Massachusetts has shown that these men were enlisted under the act of 1861 expressly; and I believe it is conceded on all hands that if they were enlisted under the act of 1861 they are entiled to the pay of thirteen dollars a month. That is not disputed. I have not looked into that subject, but I take it for granted that a soldier enlisted under the act of 1861 is entitled to thirteen dollars a month pay. They were enlisted under that act. Now when they were enlisted, though they were colored men, if they could not, in the view of the Department, be enlisted under that act and be entitled to that pay, they had no right to muster them in, and they should have discarded the enrollment at once. They should have said to the officer, "You have enlisted them under an act and for pay which the Government are not now authorized to give to people of that color. Their enlistment is altogether void, and good for nothing." If the Government took them under that written enlistment which entitled them to this pay, and mustered them into the service, they are bound to pay them according to that enlistment. There is no doubt about the law in regard to that point. It would be the most extraordinary law on earth if the Government could say to a man, "We will hold you by your enlistment. We will not be bound ourselves to reciprocate to that enlistment, and yet we will hold you."

If this be so, that law is perfectly clear, and the mustering in by an officer under the enlistment binds the Government to the terms of that enlistment. Even if they never authorized it in the world, as it is made and they agreed to it and the raising of the men under it, they must be bound by the terms of it. Otherwise they should say to the men, "You were irregularly enlisted; we cannot muster you into the service;" and let them go.

It seems to me, however, that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts does not reach the case at all. It puts the question of paying these men back to the time of their enlistment upon whether they were led to believe or did believe that they were to receive thirteen dollars a month. I do not think it makes any difference what they were led to believe or did believe. It is not to be put upon any contingency of that kind. There is the written enlistment, and it speaks for itself. If that enlistment be, as I understand it to be, under that act, and binds the Government of course to pay under that act, then if they will not give them this pay, having received the men and mustered them in and used them under that enlistment, we ought to pass a declaratory act, declaring the Government bound to pay them, and directing them to pay them in all cases according to the terms of the enlistment which was written and received. It should be an act by itself directing them to pay according to the terms of the contract made at the time. I would not put it upon any contingency as to whether the men were led or not led so to believe. That does not alter anything at all. That is the loosest of all possible modes of legislation. It so strongly reminds me of an anecdote of the last war, that will be an illustration of it, that I cannot but tell it.

We had a lieutenant by the name of Bezeau, who was a famous recruiting officer. I say "we" because I was then in the service. He was sent down to Middleburg, in Vermont, to recruit in the winter of 1812-13. In the spring the recruits were brought in. There were about seventy or eighty of them. When we came to muster them in according to their enlistment it was found on examining the men that he enlisted one as a major, two as chaplains, about twenty men to each base drum, and three or four as lieutenants. [Laughter.] When we came to take off the citizen clothes and put the soldier's uniform on them and place them in the ranks, there was distress and trouble enough. If we had been compelled to carry out the assurances they had received, I do not know how we should ever have done it. I will only add that Bezeau took care to stipulate that he should never serve with his own recruits. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I now move after the word "service" in the ninth line to strike out the words "during the whole time in which they shall be or shall have been in such service," and to insert in lieu thereof "from and after the 1st day of January, 1864."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer an amendment, to insert at the end of the resolution the following:

Provided, That from the monthly pay of every such person mustered into the service in States or parts of States where, by the proclamation of the President, the insurrection exists, there shall be reserved the sum of four dollars per month for the purpose of reimbursing the expenses incurred by the United States in feeding and clothing women and children of color in said States or districts.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate on this subject, but simply to call their attention to a fact which was stated the other day. In those districts where the insurrection exists, and where our armies enter into a territory where there are large multitudes of persons of color, the men, women, and children come flocking together in crowds to them. The men are enlisted into our service, and the women and children and the decrepit old men are upon our hands to clothe and feed and provide for. This item of expense is very large, and will probably grow larger upon the Government as we proceed with these enlistments. I can conceive a very great difference between the colored people, situated as they are in the insurrectionary districts, from their situation in Massachusetts or Ohio, where they live with their families regularly like all other citizens of the United States. In the insurrectionary districts they are entirely broken up. The men, women, and children, as I have said, come together and cluster around our camps. They are fed and clothed at the expense of the Government; and it is but just that a portion of the pay of the able-bodied men who are enlisted in those districts should be reserved to meet these expenses. Otherwise if we give to these men precisely the same pay that we give to the white soldiers, who have to provide for their wives and children at home, and if we, at the same time, have these persons on our hands to feed and clothe, we do more than justice; we do injustice.

In conversation with a person of great knowledge, in the commissary department, on this very subject the other day, it was estimated by him that in those sections of the country, for every able-bodied soldier we put into our ranks there will be about four persons, women and children or decrepit old men, upon our hands. We must in some way or other prevent their starving. The expense of providing for them is very great. As I said the other day, my attention has been called to this subject from the fact that, being connected with the Indian department somewhat, the great expense of providing for the refugee Indians in Kansas has been pressed upon my attention. I suppose the expenses we have incurred there have been at the rate of $1,000 a day for feeding refugee Indians. The men have been enlisted in regiments, and have gone to help us to subjugate the rebel Indians and take possession of the Indian country, but the women and children are on our hands. It is a very important consideration. It seems to me the amendment is strictly just.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is simply mustering into the service of the United States these colored soldiers, and then taking a portion of their pay to support colored persons in those districts. I hope the United States will not assume any such position as that; will not institute any such system. I think the means of supporting dependent persons in those districts should come from some other source than from the thirteen dollars a month of the private soldier. I do not undertake, and will not follow the matter out in detail as to the difficulty, the injustice that will arise from such an application, and the difficulty of carrying it out. Upon the face of the proposition it is an ungenerous and an unjust one, in my opinion. Of course I attribute and ascribe no such motives to the honorable Senator who has presented it. It is entirely repugnant both to my feelings and my reason.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is not only just, to my mind, but it is in accordance with the practice of the Government with regard to other employes of the Government. We retain a portion of the pay of persons in the Navy in order to constitute a fund from which the expenses of naval hospitals are paid. We levy a tax, or rather the State of New York does, upon emigrants who arrive in this country in the city of New York for the purpose of providing for the sick and disabled and poor who come over as emigrants. There are several funds provided for by law which are made up by contributions levied upon the labor of persons in that particular employment, sailors and soldiers. I am not familiar with the law, but I know that a fund connected with the Navy is made up by contributions levied upon persons in the employ of the Navy.

When a soldier, a white freeman, enters the service, he must provide out of his pay for his family. In some cases they may depend upon local charity; but in the great body of cases he must take his pay or a large portion of it to provide for his family at home. That lessens, therefore, his compensation to that extent. But in the southern States the relations of families do not exist; they are not recognized by law, and therefore, when an able-bodied negro man enters the military service he leaves dependent on charity, in want of the common necessities of life, those who have been connected with him by ties of blood or marriage. When we pay to the negro soldier in the southern States the same pay we pay our most favored sons in the northern States, there is no reason, there is no justice why he should not be burdened with the expense of taking care of his wife and children, his father and mother, and those who are dependent upon him. As you cannot by law require him to take care of those who are connected with him by the domestic ties, it is but proper to levy a contribution on his compensation, so as to make him pay a reasonable share to provide for these contingencies.

I say, therefore, it is not only justified by reason, but it is justified to some extent by the practice of the Government. If we pay the negro soldiers the full pay allowed by law to our own soldiers, and then do not charge them with taking care of the poor and indigent, the old and the infirm of the population from among whom they enlisted, we give them an advantage, we make a discrimination in their favor as against the white soldiers; because you will be compelled by the common motive of charity to provide for the women and children in the southern States when you take from among them the able-bodied men. We shall be compelled by a necessity which we all recognize to appropriate money for that purpose, and there is no reason in the world why they should not be charged with providing for the very class of people who are left unprovided for by our soldiers at home. There is no injustice in it at all.

There is another consideration. These negroes for the first time will receive pay, money. They will not know the value of that money. They will not take care of it, probably, with that care to the same extent as our northern people would. They have not yet become accustomed to the care and custody of money; and therefore I think it is but wise that Congress should, as the agent of these negroes, take care of a portion of their wages and distribute it to those who are connected with them by blood or marriage.

It seems to me, therefore, the principle of the amendment is justified. If you do not do it you will pay the black soldier what is allowed by law to the white soldier, and in addition to that you will have to incur a very large expense in taking care of the wife or children, or the father or the mother of this very soldier to whom you pay the full pay of the white soldier. I do not think that is just.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me there are some objections to this proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. There is not much analogy between the naval case that he has cited and the case here. There is a very great difference between taking fifty cents a month out of the sailor's pay who enlists with the perfect knowledge that that sum is going to be taken out of his pay and given to the support of a naval hospital, and taking four dollars out of the monthly pay of the man who has already enlisted and been rendering service for six months and expects to render it for thirty months longer. We have entered into a contract with these colored men to pay them ten dollars a month; and according to the construction of some gentlemen we have entered into a contract to pay them thirteen dollars a month. Now, it is proposed by this proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, by an act of Congress, to take four dollars of that pay so that it will leave him only nine dollars a month, a little less than he had before the passage of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. We give with one hand and take away with two.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This bill provides that we shall not only pay him that sum, but it gives him clothing besides; in fact, making his pay $16 50 a month. We raise the pay by this bill. As to the particular sum with which the blank is filled, whether it is four or three dollars, I am not so particular about that. It is the principle that I contend for. If other gentlemen prefer that it should be fixed at three dollars I have no objection to that.

Mr. GRIMES. We have clothed all these soldiers before the passage of this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This adds to the clothing.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, it may be true, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, that the marital relation is not recognized by the laws of the States where colored people are enlisted or to be enlisted; but they exist in fact, and those men who are enlisted in our service have wives that they recognize as such, and many of them have children. Many of them have not. But is it just to take four dollars from the pay of a man who has no wife and put it into a common fund? Would that be just here among ourselves? Would it be just as applied to white soldiers? As an illustration, if Robert Small, that gallant man who brought out the Planter from the harbor of Charleston and delivered her to Admiral Du Pont, and who afterwards piloted our naval vessels into Stono Inlet from whence Charleston might have been taken with the proper amount of energy, if he was in the Army of the United States, supporting, as he does, his wife and family by his own labor, just as white soldiers support their wives and children by their own labor, would it be just to Robert Small to take four dollars from his pay and put it into a common fund for the benefit of other people's families? Why should this rule be applied to the colored soldiers there and not to the white soldiers?

Mr. WILSON. We have had to support a great many of the wives and children of white men down there as a matter of humanity.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; I am told that in some portions of the country where our armies are in possession we support as many white people as we do colored people, refugees, Union men, I suppose, at heart, or supposed to be Union men. I learn it from a gentleman just from Tennessee, who has been engaged in recruiting a loyal white regiment in Tennessee. Why should not the same rule extend to those men who have been enlisted in Tennessee that you are going to extend to these colored men? Is there any reason?

Mr. CONNESS. Why should it not exist all over the country?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; why should it not exist all over the country? I am in favor of applying the same rule to these people that is applied to other soldiers. Let them stand on a perfect equality before the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. By this bill we propose to increase the pay of black soldiers substantially nine dollars a month.

Mr. WILSON. Six dollars and a half.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will show that it is nine. By the present law a colored soldier gets ten dollars a month; and from that is deducted three dollars for clothing, which leaves him seven dollars. We have already given our assent to the bill which raises his pay to sixteen dollars a month, besides clothing. That will undoubtedly pass the House. There is no opposition to it. Then the addition is nine dollars a month. That raises his pay from seven dollars net to sixteen dollars net, or from ten dollars gross to nineteen dollars gross, including his clothing, of course. Under the bill as it will pass he gets sixteen dollars a month and clothing. That is the effect of it. We have therefore raised the pay of these black soldiers nine dollars a month. It is not, as Senators have been arguing here for the last day or two, only an addition of three dollars a month. It is an addition of nine dollars a month.

Now is it unjust, when we are about to double the pay of this class of soldiers, negro soldiers in the southern States, because the amendment only applies to the negro soldiers raised in the southern States, for us to provide that out of this increased pay a fund shall be raised out of which the women and children and the poor of those States shall be supported? I do not think so at all. Otherwise you might just as well appropriate money to be distributed and disbursed in charity among those negroes in the southern States in addition to this large increase of pay. It may be, and I think myself the Senator from Wisconsin has put the amount too high. Four dollars a month may be too high. Perhaps a less sum would be sufficient. But it seems to me that we ought to provide out of this increased pay a fund to take care of the women and children in these States; otherwise you do not put these negro soldiers on an equality with the white soldiers, but you give them an advantage over the white soldier, who by his domestic relations recognized by law is bound by law to take care of his wife, his children, and, by our law, his parents. The slave who enlists in your service has no such legal obligations resting on him. While the soldier who enlists from Ohio is fighting for us his wife and his children are contracting legal liabilities for him which he by law is bound to pay. In the southern States that does not exist.

I say, therefore, there ought to be a discrimination there in the pay between black soldiers enlisted in the southern States and white soldiers, or there ought to be a fund reserved from their pay to provide for these contingencies. The Senator says it would be unjust to take two dollars a month or four dollars a month out of the pay of a single black man in the southern States for this purpose. He thinks we should not take the same amount out of his pay as out of the pay of one who has a family. I do not think there is any injustice in it. We are raising the pay of these soldiers. If we were not raising their pay we could not change the existing contract. They have enlisted under a contract which gives them but seven dollars a month net. We propose to increase that to sixteen dollars net. We may decide what shall be done with this increased pay. It seems to me it is but fair and just.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator will allow me to ask him a question. It is the purpose of the Senate and the country to enlist just as many of these colored soldiers as possible. If they go into the civil service or if they are employed in any ordinary vocation of life they will probably get at the present rates twenty dollars a month.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, in Tennessee, in Memphis, in Vicksburg, and all the places along the Mississippi river they are getting as high pay as that. There is to be no deduction from the pay of the men engaged in that work. Now how will it be possible for us to raise any more recruits if we are going to give them but nine dollars a month when they can get at least nineteen or twenty dollars in any other avocation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say we are doing for the negro what is not done for the white man. By this bill we are giving to the negro more pay than he could possibly get for any service in the southern States, even if he were a free man, while we do not give to the white soldier anything like what he could get as a laboring man on the farms of the West or in any of the manufacturing establishments of the North. A laboring man in the northern States in almost any civil employment can get more pay than he can get as a soldier, while a negro, slave or free, in the southern States cannot ordinarily get anything like what you give the black soldier under this bill. Therefore I say the discrimination is all in favor of the black as against the white soldier. I want to put them on a footing of perfect equality. I am in favor of the principle of this resolution, and shall vote for it; but I do think we ought to reserve from the compensation paid to the black soldier an amount sufficient to charge him with the obligation that by law is imposed upon the white soldier, and that is the support of those who are naturally dependent upon him, or those in a dependent condition of life among whom he lives. I think it is but fair, reasonable, and right.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I think we shall be in inextricable difficulties so long as we legislate for one class of persons one way and another class another way; and the remark I would desire to make I would apply not only to this bill, but to legislation generally. If we intend to make colored men soldiers, why not have the same law apply to them that applies to other soldiers? So long as we undertake to make this class legislation, we shall be compelled to change it at every session, and be involved in difficulties that will never terminate.

I do not see the necessity of this amendment for another reason. The laboring class at the South is not confined to the men at all. The man whom we enlist as a soldier feels no particular responsibility for his family. Slavery has not allowed him to feel any such responsibility. His family has been owned off in another portion of the county or State, and he does not see them perhaps once a week or once a month. From the very nature of the case, the family follows the fortunes of the mother. She supports them, takes care of them, and labors for them. It is a great fact that in slavery there is just about as much work performed by the females as by the males; and the state of society to which the Senator from Ohio alludes as existing at the North does not exist in the South at all. There is no reason why we should take a portion of the wages of these colored soldiers to support their families; because their families support themselves, and have always done so. These men never did contribute a dollar to the support of their families unless they got it by overwork, or in some way their masters did not know of. Every family has been separate and distinct from the head of the family. The state of society from the condition of slavery is such that it has rendered it necessary that the father feels no particular responsibility, and cannot be held to responsibility for his family.

I think, therefore, we should not attempt to set apart a fund out of a portion of the pay of colored soldiers to support other portions of the colored people in their vicinity. It is only necessary that we have certain cities of refuge for them, as we have here on the border. To be sure, the colored people run out of Virginia and into Washington, and, this being a kind of city of refuge, we had to establish places and camps for them so that they can be taken care of. But this state of facts does not exist at all in a State where we propose that they shall all go free, and it would not have existed here if we could have had this country bordering on the District of Columbia. The true principle is that the soldiers enlisted in our armies should be on one level, have one pay, and no more money should be reserved from the pay of one class than from the pay of another; and until we come up to that standard we shall be in inextricable difficulty.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that this joint resolution was framed to meet, to some extent, the point made by the Senator from Wisconsin in this amendment. If Senators will read the joint resolution, they will see that we provide for the payment to colored men of such a bounty as may be determined upon by the President of the United States. The President may pay in the loyal States a bounty of $100 to colored men who shall enlist. In the States covered by the proclamation, or the rebel States, he may, in his discretion, pay no bounty at all. He may save this bounty for the very purpose of taking care of the women and children in that portion of the country. We framed the bill with that view. I think that will be ample and sufficient.

I do not believe that since this rebellion commenced the colored women and children have cost this Government anything at all. I know that on the Atlantic coast we owe them money to-day. We owe them thousands of dollars. Down on the coast of South Carolina some women are earning more than two hundred dollars a year by raising cotton. I know parties that have paid families from two to three hundred dollars a year for the cotton they have raised themselves and brought into market. I tell you further, the Government of the United States is paying colored men to-day on a fortification in Florida from thirty-five to forty dollars a month. They are employed by regular officers there, and paid that amount because they are skilled workmen, and are admitted to be among the best mechanics in the country.

The truth is, we are picking up men on the Atlantic coast and forcing them into the service of the United States at seven dollars a month who outside can earn twenty or twenty-five dollars a month easily. They are running away from our recruiting officers and hiding themselves in order to do work at a great price instead of going into the service at the small rate we pay them. Along the Mississippi river, in the great breakings up we have had there, they may be some expense to the country. But we take those people and set them to work; and, as was said by the Senator from Kansas, those women and children are accustomed to outdoor work; they are readily employed on the plantations; and instead of being a burden they are a benefit, and earn more than they cost to the Government.

Now, sir, we are dealing out rations to colored people in some portions of the southern country. They are working for us at the same time; and many of the men and boys are receiving as high as twenty or twenty-five dollars a month for services rendered our officers, and this labor is scarce; it can hardly be obtained at all.

We are dealing out rations to white people, some of them the wives and children of rebel soldiers, by the tens of thousands. I was told by a colonel of the Army a day or two ago that we are giving out at Norfolk or in that neighborhood nearly three thousand rations daily to white people who do nothing at all. The colored people come around our encampments or go on the plantations, on lands that are let out to work. If we give anything to them they are set at work as early as possible and earn their living. White people come around, and, as a matter of humanity to keep them from starving, we are dealing out rations to them, but they do not go to work.

I do not think we need trouble ourselves at all about the women and children of these colored people. I believe they can take care of themselves. There may be times and occasions when they cost the Government something; but taking the year through and the country through, since this war commenced, they have paid for what has been given, and they are the only class of people in that country to whom we have given anything that have done it. All over that country where our armies are going we are dealing out rations as a matter of humanity to keep the life in the white people, and many of them are the families of men who are fighting us on the battle-field.

Now, sir, I think as we have made this distinction in the resolution in regard to bounty so that we can reserve the $100 bounty or a large portion of it in that part of the country, I think that will be ample. We placed that provision in the resolution for that very purpose. When a colored man enlists in the loyal States, there is no reason why he should not have the $100 bounty; and we provide for it and we authorize the President if he chooses to give it to him; but we leave the amount discretionary in his hands. General Butler says that in that portion of Virginia under his command he can get men for a bounty of ten dollars. There is no need then of giving any more there. We propose to give more where we do need it; but we can reserve out of this bounty ample means to support these people.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not mean to detain the Senate for any time at all upon the point of the injustice of taking from these men the pay to secure which has occasioned a struggle here running through parts of five or six different days, in a full debate each day. But I should like to know, before I vote in favor of this amendment, what is to become of this fund, or who is to have the control and distribution of it? If we have fifty thousand colored troops in the southern States this sum of four dollars a month retained from their wages would amount to $200,000 a month, and it will be more or less according to the number of these men enlisting in the service. I do not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes any plan or disposition whatever. The money, then, will either lie in the Treasury, to be disposed of under the direction of the President or the Secretary of War in any way they may see fit, or we shall be required to enact another law creating commissioners or officers, with salaries and perquisites, for the purpose of disposing of this fund and seeing that it is properly applied; and after we have passed such a law I am by no means certain that the agents and commissioners and persons charged with the distribution of the fund will not receive by far the largest part of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend from New Jersey—

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire him while he is up, if he pleases, to answer this question: what does he propose to do in the case of those negroes who enlist as soldiers who have no wives or children, who leave no poor behind them? Does he propose taking four dollars per month from their pay to be given to the support of the poor of their district? I desire an answer to that question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from California did not hear the speech of the Senator from Kansas I desire to call his attention to some facts which he stated. He stated the fact to be that in all that section of the United States to which this provision applies, the able-bodied men, although they have women and children, are not under any obligation to support them, and never have been. Therefore those who have women and children enlist perfectly free from all obligation to support them. The support of the women and children heretofore devolved upon the masters who employed them, and now will devolve on the Government; whereas in the other section of the country, where the institution of slavery does not exist, colored men have their families, their wives and their children, which they are bound legally to support, just as much as white men are. The white soldier who enlists in our armies has persons dependent upon him for support and whom he is bound to support, his wife and children and his decrepit and old parents. If you give him but thirteen dollars a month to pay him for his services with all those legal and binding obligations upon him to support during his absence his wife and children, and at the same time go into another section and enlist by hundreds and thousands colored men who have wives and children and yet are not bound to support them, who are without any legal obligation to support them, and give them the same pay while their women and children flock in crowds around our armies to be fed from our commissary stores and clothed from the clothing that comes from our quartermaster's department—if you do that, I say you have forgotten that white men are as good as negroes at least.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall be through in a single moment. I wish to reply to the inquiry of my friend from New Jersey. He asks what will become of this fund? Why, sir, the fund will remain in the Treasury. It will not be paid out. It is to remain in the Treasury to reimburse these expenses which the United States Government incurs in its commissary and quartermaster's department that are issuing rations by thousands and hundreds of thousands to these people. I repeat it has been estimated, by a gentleman fully acquainted with this subject, that for every able-bodied man in this section which you will put in your Army you will have four persons to be fed and provided for till you can get your plantation system arranged. Perhaps when the plantation system shall be arranged and all these people set at work, they will earn sufficient to pay for their food and clothing. But this is an expense that we are now subjected to; and while we are contending for equality and justice, I demand justice for the white man as well as the negro.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire briefly to state the reasons that will govern my vote on this question. The negro soldier has now proved his capacity for endurance equal to the white soldier. He has shown his fighting qualities to be, if not equal to those of the white soldier, valuable to the country. So far as I am concerned, I desire to put the one upon the same footing as the other. Let us have no discrimination between the soldiers who sustain the flag of the country and who mingle their blood in the same great cause. I desire to remind the Senator from Wisconsin of a fact which he seems to have forgotten. The white soldier has his family supported and sustained by the States or communities from whence he comes.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, no; that is not the case in most of the States.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I beg the Senator's pardon; so far as the State I in part represent is concerned, the destitute families of soldiers are liberally sustained by the patriotic community in which they reside. There are some, I grant you, who are not; but it is the benevolent and the patriotic that sustain the destitute families of white soldiers in Kansas, and I presume it is the case in every State of this Union. Some of the States,

I believe, appropriate money for that purpose, not to sustain the families of colored soldiers, but to sustain the families of white soldiers.

Sir, we have lost a great deal by discriminating against the colored soldiers. In my opinion, had they been placed on the same footing at the outset with the white soldiers, the so-called confederate government would not have dared to discriminate against them in the exchange of prisoners. We invited that pretended government to discriminate against them. We made the discrimination ourselves, and said to Jeff. Davis and his accursed pretended government, in effect, You may discriminate between the black and the white soldiers clothed in our uniform and shedding their blood for the same cause. We induced the pretended confederate government to discriminate against the colored soldier. In violation of all the rules that govern civilized warfare, they have dared to do it upon our invitation. It is time for our own honor that we strike down the discrimination between the soldiers of the United States. We have catered to this prejudice too long. When we put the uniform of the United States upon a person, he should be the peer of any one who wears the same uniform, without reference to complexion.

Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin, as has been said by my colleague and by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the families of the colored soldiers are self-sustaining machines almost from the moment they enter our lines. They have been taught to sustain themselves, and they do sustain themselves. I hope that this amendment will not receive a single vote in this Chamber, for it is a discrimination between the soldiers of the Army of the United States, and an invitation to Jeff. Davis to persist in his brutal treatment of our gallant troops.

Mr. CONNESS. My understanding has always been, in addition to what the honorable Senator from Kansas has said just now, that the families of the blacks are and have been self-sustaining, that they have also sustained the whites in those States in addition.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That is so.

Mr. CONNESS. I knew the Senator would assent to it, because it is a palpable fact, and I think it would be very hard to controvert it. To controvert it, it would be necessary to prove that the producers of the country were not the source of its wealth. But I will not debate that proposition.

The Senator from Wisconsin tells us that it is not proposed to take this money derived from the four dollars per month to be deducted from the pay of the soldiers from the Treasury at all, but it is to be kept in the Treasury as an equivalent for the amount that is now spent by the Government in giving rations to the poor blacks. Then I should like to ask that Senator why he proposes to raise the pay of the black soldiers to thirteen dollars a month? Why does he not honestly and fairly propose that it shall be four dollars less than thirteen dollars, namely, nine dollars, with rations and clothing? Is not that what it means? Are you going to tell an official falsehood by telling the country and these black soldiers that they shall have precisely the same amount per month for their services that white soldiers receive, and then when the paymaster comes to pay them they are to have four dollars a month less? Why less? The amendment proposed says it is for the purpose of feeding their families.

But the Senator who offers the amendment constructs his own language, and we are bound to take his construction as a correct one, that so far from going to support their families it is simply to be retained in the Treasury and is not to be paid out at all. I asked him the simple question, which he did not answer, but that was his privilege, what he was to do in case deductions of this kind were made from the pay of soldiers who had no families? I should like to know whether he means to say there are not such soldiers, that there are not colored men who enlist and are mustered into the service who have no families? I should like to know what kind of justice there is in taking his money to be applied to the support of colored persons living in his district? Is he to be mulcted in a fine because he happens to live in or come from a district where there are impoverished persons of his color? I apprehend there is no justice in that.

Now, a word in regard to the remark of the Senator from Ohio and the comment upon it of the Senator from Iowa, that it is a corresponding case to the retention of a portion of the pay of sailors and soldiers for soldiers' homes and for sailors' homes and hospital purposes. I say there is no correspondence or parallel in the cases. In the one instance there are established institutions that are intended to be and remain through all time. The machinery for carrying them on, the rules and discipline according to which they shall be maintained, are existing facts, and they are to continue to exist; and such small pittance as is retained from the compensation of sailors and soldiers to be applied to the support of those institutions is known by the sailor or the soldier before he enters the service; and in addition to that it is to be most economically and exactly applied.

But if, contrary to the construction put by the Senator from Wisconsin on his own amendment, this four dollars a month is to constitute a fund which would be distributed, as the Senator from New Jersey says, by a new corps of officers and retainers, who in fact would be supported by the black soldiers, I apprehend it would make a condition of things that would be rather a shame and a disgrace to our country than the contrary. If, however, we are to accept the construction placed on the amendment by the honorable Senator who has presented it here, namely, that the money is never to leave the Treasury at all, and yet we are to write in our law that they shall be paid the same amount that white soldiers are, and that all distinctions, after the 1st of January, 1864, in that respect are to cease, I should like to know how we can escape from the glaring inconsistency that we pretend to do that which we do not do. I agree entirely with the Senator from Kansas in the hope that such an amendment will not be sustained by any considerable vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from California seems to think that I am involved in some inconsistency by saying this money will be reserved in the Treasury. The amendment provides that it is to be reserved in the Treasury to reimburse the expenses which we incur. The fact is that we are incurring these expenses every day by thousands of dollars. And in relation to this amendment, so far from drawing a distinction against the colored man, it is simply placing the colored soldier and the white soldier upon something like a footing of equality. If you pay an equal sum to the colored soldier that you do to the white soldier, and support his family too, you do more for him than you do for the white soldier.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator right there, suppose he has no family?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kansas, as I stated before, explained the state of society within those States where this amendment would apply; that, while these men have not families which they can legally be compelled to support as a family, they have women and children in fact—

Mr. CONNESS. I submit to the honorable Senator that he should answer the question. What is he going to do in the case of those soldiers who have no families?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Under the laws of those States and the statement made by my friend from Kansas, none of them have any families; but they are the able-bodied men who enlisted into the armies; and I say that if they enlisted into the armies, their women and children should be provided for; and if they are not in that state of society where those women and children are regarded as constituting families, whom they are legally bound to support, we have a right ourselves to impose upon the able-bodied men a portion of the duty at least of supporting their women and children. That is the difference, and my friend will be unable to get rid of that difference. Let me tell him, though it is a matter he may smile at now, that the time will come when the proposition to give the colored soldiers additional advantages to those which the white soldiers possess will not be a proposition at which the Senator will smile. It is a proposition that will take hold of the heart of this country, and the people will insist that, while they may be put on a footing of equality, they shall not be put upon a superior footing to the white soldiers in the Army.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, in the good

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 41.

old days of peace, in the slaveholding States the negroes had holiday every Saturday afternoon, and as all persons are now equal before the law, I think we are entitled to it. [Laughter.] But half of the afternoon has already been spent in the service of our colored friends. Still, if we can have a vote soon upon this proposition, I shall not submit the motion which when I rose I intended to submit, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us finish this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, let us finish it.

Mr. CARLILE. I do not make the motion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to make an appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin. We have the spectacle presented to us to-day of a mass of people, every one of them loyal, enlisting in the armies of the United States under officers of a different race, and willingly so enlisting. We have presented to us the fact that those men, of a different race from ourselves, are enlisting with a knowledge that if captured by the enemy they are not to be treated as prisoners of war. They are enlisting in a body whenever they have the opportunity; and at a time like this, for us to attempt to discriminate against them seems to me to be highly unjust and highly impolitic. It is a spectacle never before witnessed. The announcement that persons captured were not to be treated as prisoners of war, if made to our race, would have stopped enlistments; and yet these men are coming in, confident that this Government will finally compel a recognition of their rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I merely wish to make one remark to call the attention of the Senate to a fact which shows the incongruity of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I presume the Senator is not aware of the fact which I am about to mention, or he surely would not have brought forward this amendment. In point of fact, the regiments numbered one and three in Louisiana are composed of freemen, not old slaves, but of men who were born freemen, with wives and families; and yet those two regiments would come under the provision of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and they would be reduced to a pay of nine dollars a month.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend is mistaken. The proclamation did not apply to the district where they were enlisted. They were enlisted where the proclamation did not apply.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator, I think, is mistaken.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think not. They were enlisted in New Orleans.

Mr. SUMNER. The regiments were enlisted in Louisiana; and the Senator carries a doubt into the question of their pay. I have been assured this morning by a colonel of one of those regiments that these are persons who were born freemen. The Senator assumes that they might have been enlisted in New Orleans. It does not follow from any knowledge that we have that they were enlisted as the Senator supposes. At any rate, his proposition if adopted by Congress would throw a doubt over the question of their pay.

But I will not go into any discussion of the merits of this measure. The Senator from Wisconsin concluded his first remarks on the proposition by sentimentally saying that he regarded it as strictly just. I content myself with saying that I regard it as strictly unjust.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As a question has arisen in relation to the amount with which the blank is filled, and some suggest that it had better be three dollars instead of four dollars, I shall amend the proposition by inserting three dollars instead of four dollars. And as the Senator from Massachusetts raises a question whether it may not apply to freemen with families, I am willing to insert "those who have been slaves and are enlisted."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified upon the suggestion of the mover.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL, (at five minutes to three o'clock.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer this amendment to come in at the close of the joint resolution:

And that all recruiting officers of colored troops already mustered into the service or hereafter to be mustered into the same shall be entitled to the same premium allowed to recruiting officers of other troops.

As the law stands now recruiting officers are allowed nothing for the recruits that they procure for the regiments of colored troops—I believe not a cent. This state of the law has operated in some instances to produce great hardships to the recruiting officers, and has occasioned heavy losses in several instances that have come within my own knowledge. And as it seems to be the desire and purpose of the Senate to put the colored troops and the white troops of the United States on the same footing, I can certainly see no reason why the recruiting officers of colored troops should not be placed on the same footing with those of white troops, and it is for this purpose that I offer the amendment. As I have said, there are many cases of very severe hardship which have grown out of the fact that recruiting officers of colored troops receive no compensation in the shape of premium.

Mr. COWAN. I propose to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator's proposition applies to the body of the joint resolution it is not now in order. If it applies simply to the amendment moved by the Senator from Michigan, it is in order; if it embraces other portions of the resolution, it is not in order.

Mr. COWAN. I propose my amendment as a substitute for the whole resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is not in order at this time. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he should limit his amendment. It is not right certainly to allow recruiting officers in the disloyal States, where when our Army moves these men are recruited by the thousands, the same fees as in the loyal States. It would become a source of wonderful profit. They will be recruited by thousands and tens of thousands.

Mr. HOWARD. It is very possible that there may be an inconvenience of that sort growing out of the amendment, and I will submit a further amendment, that it be at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified.

Mr. GRIMES. I would like to know if the Senator from Michigan intends that this provision shall be retrospective?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. To apply to the seventy regiments now in service?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust it will not be adopted, then.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to hear the amendment reported. I did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported as modified by the mover.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And that all recruiting officers of colored troops already mustered into the service or hereafter to be mustered into the same shall be entitled to the same premium allowed to recruiting officers of other troops, at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This amendment ought not to pass. I desire to say to the Senate that the first regiment of Kansas colored troops were raised by one sloop; just by sending out patrols they were brought right in. The recruiting officers of that regiment, who really had no duty to discharge, will receive pay that they ought not to receive under this amendment. Although I would be glad to have it done so far as profit to my State is concerned, I must say that it would be highly unjust.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Kansas will observe that the whole subject is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War. If a fact of that sort should be brought to his knowledge, as a matter of course he would be cautious how he applied the rule, but as a general rule it seems to me that it is correct. I know of a single instance where a recruiting officer of colored troops has almost ruined himself in consequence of the undertaking which he assumed, to raise a regiment of colored troops, from the very fact that he could not obtain any compensation whatever in the shape of premium.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It places a very great temptation before me. I raised a regiment of troops in the way that I say, as commissioner of recruiting for the Government, by just one swoop, and as commissioner of recruiting I should be entitled to these fees. I do hope that the amendment will not be entertained.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator would not be entitled to the money if that fact should come to the knowledge of the Secretary of War, because he would administer the law, I suppose, with equity.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think the temptation should not be held out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COWAN. I propose to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert this amendment:

That from and after the passage of this resolution, the soldiers of the United States of America of the same grade and service shall be entitled to the same pay, rations, and pension.

Mr. SUMNER. I have an amendment to offer to the original proposition, which will be in order before the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, being to perfect the original resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order. No question can be taken upon substituting the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the original resolution until amendments to the resolution itself shall have been exhausted.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to take advantage of the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] and I offer this amendment:

Provided, That in all cases of past service, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War by the actual papers of enlistment, that such persons were enlisted as volunteers under the act of July, 1861, the pay promised by that act shall be allowed from the commencement of such service.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely wish to say a word in relation to what the gentleman has said about consulting my suggestion. If he would take my whole suggestion, it would do. That was that if the Government should refuse to pay men according to their enlistment papers under which they were mustered in, there should be an act relating to that special case directing them to do it; but it should not be ingrafted into any general law.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say that if this were submitted as an independent proposition I should vote for it; but I have steadily voted against incumbering this bill with any propositions that have come in from different quarters; and I intend to continue to do so until we get it through.

Mr. SUMNER. This can be no incumbrance to the bill; it will help to make the bill lighter.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Conness, Dixon, Foster, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment either to the original resolution or to the proposed substitute, the question now is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] in the form of a substitute for the whole resolution.

Mr. COWAN. I will simply state, Mr. President, that in the Constitution there was no distinction taken as to color between the citizens of this Republic. The word "slave" was sedulously kept out of that instrument. And in the first place, I think in the first clause of the instrument, where he was alluded to at all he was put upon the same footing with our wives and our children and our people who are non-electors. He was counted in the census in order to entitle him to a representation upon the floor of the House of Representatives; and although he might not have been counted as a unit, he was counted as a fraction. In the next clause he was considered the same as though he were a foreigner—that clause which prevents a tax from being levied upon the importation of any persons after a particular year; and lastly he was put upon precisely the same footing with our apprentices in the fugitive clause.

Now, Mr. President, I am in favor of continuing that idea and proceeding upon that hypothesis throughout. I can conceive of no greater mischief in a republic than that it should have two classes of citizens requiring separate classes of laws and making distinctions between them; and I think it would have been better from the outstart of this difficulty just to consider the negro as the Constitution considers him, to consider him as a person, not as a chattel, not as property, but as a citizen protected in his life and limb. I do not know whether his reputation was protected or not; but certainly it was an offense to murder him, and equally an offense to maim him. Then being protected, he owed allegiance; and owing allegiance he was bound to render military service just the same as any other man was. I think that idea should be carried out.

I cannot conceive of a republic existing at all recognizing all through in its laws such a distinction as we have been taking between the negro and the white man. I suppose you could just as well make it between the men who have red hair and the men who have black hair, or the men who have fair hair and the men who have gray hair. To me it would have precisely the same significance under our Constitution. I have been, therefore, from the beginning in favor of the hypothesis I now suggest, that the negro be treated precisely the same as another man, particularly in the suppression of this rebellion. I think I long ago said to the Senate that when our armies proceed southward, for the purpose of restoring peace and order, and the influence of the Government and the laws, if they found the negro an enemy and in arms they would kill him, capture him, just as another man; if they found him a friend, they would use him.

Now, Mr. President, what could be simpler? Nothing that I can conceive of. But it was said then and perhaps will be said now, "Suppose somebody comes and claims this man as a chattel from the military officer?" The answer is obvious. He has a right to say, "I cannot tell whether this is your chattel or no;" or as somebody put it very well, "I cannot tell whether you own the nigger or the nigger owns you. I find this man a person, so designated by the great charter of the Government which I serve, and I will treat him as such. If it so happens that he is not that you must find your remedy elsewhere. I have no authority to determine."

In the same way when the militia of the nation are to be enrolled I would make no distinction whatever; I would enroll all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of twenty and forty-five as we have it now, if you please, without stopping to ascertain whether one man was fairer or darker than another. If we cannot get along upon that hypothesis here we shall never get along. If we cannot administer our laws by considering the citizens all upon the same footing we cannot get along by dividing them into classes and legislating for classes.

But this mischief has to a certain extent taken place; it has prevailed. We gave to white men thirteen dollars a month and we gave to black men ten dollars a month. Now what is the simple remedy? Why, sir, I would suggest, with all deference to the opinions of other men who have more wisdom and more experience in regard to this matter than I have, that we should retrace our footsteps and from henceforth just simply put them all on the same footing; let it be enacted from this time henceforth that all soldiers of the Republic of the same grade and in the same arm of the service shall be entitled to the same pay, the same rations, and the same pension. Who can object to that? Is it not effecting justice to everybody? It puts us on ground upon which we can stand not only now but in all time hereafter, and we stand, too, precisely where our fathers did when they made the Constitution; we stand without recognizing this distinction among our people.

I trust, therefore, that this amendment will prevail, that this substitute will be adopted for the original resolution, and that henceforth we may hear nothing about this distinction which has been supposed to prevail among our citizens. I think it will be fair to every one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, after the explanation given by the Senator from Pennsylvania of the reason which has induced him to offer this amendment, even if I had been disposed to vote for it before, I will not vote for it now. When that Senator rises to address the Senate on questions in which legal principles are involved, I always listen to him with great attention and great respect. But I understand him here to advocate in his place as a Senator the doctrine that within the sense and the meaning of the Constitution a negro is a citizen of the United States. Sir, I will not enter into the discussion of that question; but the fact that such an idea has been presented to the Senate by the Senator from Pennsylvania, for whose legal knowledge I have the greatest respect, causes me to rise and simply to enter my protest against that doctrine, and to say that if that is the basis of his proposition for amendment, if that is the principle that he wishes to be recognized by the adoption of the amendment, it is so abhorrent to my views both of constitutional law and of what ought under all circumstances, not only in the past and in the present, but in the future, to be constitutional law, that I will not give it my support by my vote.

Sir, whatever may be my opinions in reference to the propriety of war as a means of settling our sectional difficulties, no vote of mine shall ever be given by which equality in any respect shall be recognized between the white soldier and the black soldier. Since I have listened to this debate and heard the words "colored soldiers" and "colored persons" used in it, I have tried to recollect how old I was before I ever heard that term "colored person" used. I think I was a man twenty-one years of age before I ever heard the term "colored person" used. In the section of country from which I come we use plain language and language of known signification, and the term that we have been accustomed to is "negro." Now, lo and behold, in the advancement of civilization and Christianity and refinement of which we hear so much, the negro has got to be a "colored person." [Laughter.] And when you come to provide for calling them into the public service there must be perfect equality!

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to inquire if the negroes in Delaware are not colored? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. I doubt very much whether they are so colored as they are in Wisconsin, according to the population. [Laughter.]

I did not rise, however, Mr. President, to enter into any general discussion of this question, but simply to enter my protest against the constitutional view of it presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and to say in conclusion that by no vote of mine and by no act of mine while I am a member of this body, while in public life, nor in any relation of private life which I may hereafter sustain, will I ever recognize the equality of the negro race socially, politically, or otherwise, with the white race.

Mr. COWAN. I only wish to say a single word. I think the honorable Senator from Delaware exaggerates very much the position which I assumed for the negro. He seems to confound the word "citizen" with the word "elector."

When I say that the negro is a citizen, I do not mean to say that he is equal to the white man. I mean no such thing. I do not mean to say that he is equal to a white woman, or to a white child, or to a white apprentice. I have no concern whatever with that question. That is a mere matter of taste which the Senator from Delaware and the Senators from Massachusetts may settle if they choose.* What I mean to assert, however, is that the negro under the Constitution has a particular legal status, which in my judgment makes him a citizen; and why? He is protected by the law. Being protected, and protection and allegiance being reciprocal, he is therefore a citizen. I would ask the Senator from Delaware whether a negro could not commit treason; whether he might be indicted, and convicted, and executed for treason? If he cannot be punished for treason, then we have four million people existing in the United States to-day all of whom may become traitors with impunity. I suppose no Senator would be willing to admit that such a state of affairs exists in this country, or that it ever could be allowed to exist in any country.

Mr. President, although I might be willing upon another occasion to controvert the doctrine of the Dred Scott case, and to show or attempt to show that the negro is a citizen and entitled to enter the United States courts under our judiciary laws, yet I waive that even here. I do not assert here, as against that decision, that he is a citizen for that purpose; but I do assert that he is a citizen owing allegiance to this Government, and owing that allegiance he is bound to military service, and no greater mistake in the world could be made by the Government or its Legislature than to discriminate between him and any other class of citizens owing military service. I should just as soon think of providing for the case of minors as for the case of negroes, or for the case of apprentices as for the case of negroes. And therefore I think it is that we should abolish this distinction and begin at last to legislate for the nation and to talk for the nation, and to leave those distinctions which exist between its people to be settled by the social judgment of common life, instead of the political judgment of the nation. All people are not equal anywhere. In every society there are grades superior and inferior; but who in legislation talks about those grades and proposes to legislate for them? Nobody. The lawgiver is supposed to leave that to the neighborhood in which it is found, and to allow them to adjust it, and I think properly.

Mr. CARLILE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARLILE. Do I understand the Senator to say that no one can commit treason against the Government unless he be a citizen; to advance the idea that because a negro can commit treason against the Government he must be a citizen?

Mr. COWAN. No; that is one of the non sequiturs of which I have not been guilty. I say that when the negro is protected he owes allegiance, and that as he owes allegiance he is a citizen and liable to military service. Although that allegiance may not be the allegiance to which the honorable Senator from Virginia alludes and which he evidently has in his eye, that is, the allegiance of a naturalized citizen, still it is that allegiance which makes him a citizen—the same allegiance, if you please, which makes a sojourner among us liable to treason for the time being. An alien who comes here and is protected in his sojourn among us, if he commit treason may be punished for it, and therefore owes a qualified allegiance.

I hope that this proposition will prevail, and I further hope that if it prevail and we proceed upon that theory we shall get rid of a very exciting and troublesome subject, and for the future perhaps banish "the inevitable negro" from the halls of legislation.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TEN EYCK. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is taken, I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. LANE, of Indiana] has been kept from the Senate during the latter votes of to-day's session by indisposition.

Mr. POWELL. I will state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] has been summoned home in consequence of illness in his family, and he has gone to his lodgings to make preparations to start on his journey.

Mr. WADE. I will state that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HARDING] have gone to Alexandria on committee duty.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cardie, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—14.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, February 15, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Ashtabula county, Ohio, praying for an appropriation for the repair and improvement of the harbor of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, recommending the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara on the American side. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the emancipation of all persons of African descent, held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of the commissioned officers of the one hundred and first regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, praying that all enlisted men now in the service or who hereafter may be mustered in during the present war may be indemnified for all unavoidable loss of clothing destroyed or abandoned by order of commanding officers, or in any other manner where the soldier is not responsible; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of E. D. Gird, and the petition of David D. Stelle, praying to be allowed to take out letters patent for their respective inventions on payment of the "balance fee;" which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of R. W. Carter and many other citizens of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, who represent that they are subject to taxation without representation; that the levy court of the county in whose hands is the power of taxation is not chosen by them, not responsible to them; and that a majority of its members have been appointed from among the residents of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and not from among the residents of the county. They therefore pray the passage of an act which shall give a fair representation to the citizens of the county in the levy court. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have received a communication from Lawrence A. Stimpson and Charles J. Winship, a committee appointed by the mayor and common council of Michigan City, Indiana, in relation to the improvement of the harbor at that place. It is addressed to myself; but as it discusses the importance of the improvement of that harbor, and as it is a work of much importance to the northern part of Indiana especially, I ask that it be considered and received as a petition to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of J. F. Simmons, praying for compensation for the illegal seizure of a vessel and cargo by Commander Worden, of the United States gunboat Stars and Stripes, and the subsequent wreck and loss of the same on Long Island, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES. I have been requested to ask leave to present a bill, of which previous notice has not been given, in compliance with the petition which I had the honor to present this morning from citizens of the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, leave was given to introduce the bill (S. No. 115) for the proper organization of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 116) relating to stamps; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 117) to provide for the consolidation of certain surveyor generals' districts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 118) to promote the efficiency of chaplains in the Army of the United States, and define their rank, pay, and emoluments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 119) to reorganize and promote the efficiency of the Army chaplains' department; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed on the 12th instant a bill (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I have been directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, to report that the Senate disagree with the House amendment, and I ask that the vote be taken at once. Then it will go back to the House of Representatives, and they may recede or appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Military Committee if the other House propose a substitute for the whole bill, or simply amendments to it?

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say in reply, that the House of Representatives have struck out all but the first section of the bill, and then put in an amendment which is really our own bill with a few slight modifications. We propose to disagree and let it go back; and then if they propose a committee of conference, very well. I think that is the shortest way to reach a result.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were non-concurred in.

PAYMASTER E. C. DORAN.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 94. I think it will lead to no debate. It is a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 94) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Paymaster E. C. Doran was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that all the payments made by William H. Peters, of Virginia, to the mechanics, laborers, and other employees of the Norfolk navy-yard for services and labor rendered to the 20th of April, 1861, and the rolls and vouchers therefor on file in the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, shall be legalized for the benefit of Paymaster Edward C. Doran, of the United States Navy; and the accounting officers of the Treasury are to credit him in the settlement of his account with the sum of $29,381.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a report accompanying this bill. I do not desire to have it read, but if any Senator desires to hear it, it can be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill is all right.

Mr. CLARK. I think the report had better be read.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, made by Mr. ANTHONY, from which it appears that Edward C. Doran, a paymaster in the United States Navy, was stationed at the Norfolk navy-yard in the month of April, 1861. In obedience to the orders of the commandant of the yard he proceeded to Washington to obtain instructions and advice, touching his official duties, from the Secretary of the Navy. He arrived at Washington on the 19th of April, 1861, and on the same day was ordered by the Secretary of the Navy to return to Norfolk and take charge of the vacant Navy agency, and to pay the employees of the Norfolk navy-yard the sums due them from the United States, under an arrangement approved by the Secretary. On that day an expedition left Washington to maintain possession of or destroy the Norfolk navy-yard and property, to prevent its falling into the hands of the insurrectionists; and the navy-yard was partially burnt and abandoned by our naval forces on the night of April 20, 1861. Paymaster Doran arrived at Norfolk early the following morning, and found everything in full possession of the insurgents. He was immediately seized, with all his books, accounts, and rolls, (which were vouchers to him for upward of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars,) by the rebel authorities there, and, after protesting and remonstrating in vain against the demands of the rebel officers, he was finally compelled to yield his checks to them, while he was under duress, for $29,381, under written protest, in the name and behalf of the United States Government and his securities, and upon condition that if the money were realized upon them (and he did not think it could be) it should be appropriated to the payment of the claims of the workmen and employees of the navy-yard for wages due them by the Government to April 20, 1861.

As Paymaster Doran could not negotiate drafts in Norfolk on the 18th of April, which fact he made known to the Secretary of the Navy and the deputy depository in Baltimore, he had great hopes that his checks, dated "Gosport navy-yard, April 23, 1861," (three days after its abandonment and supposed destruction by our naval authorities, an event of such magnitude as to have wide-spread notoriety before the checks could be presented for payment,) could not then be negotiated in Norfolk, and that they might not be paid by the depositories upon whom drawn.

The money was realized on those checks and paid to the employees of the Norfolk navy-yard by one William H. Peters, rebel paymaster, who forwarded to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury duly receipted rolls therefor, amounting to $24,140 14; also a schedule of other payments, amounting to $3,125 49; making together $27,265 63, leaving $115 37 to be accounted for.

A letter, of which the following is a copy, was transmitted with the rolls by Captain F. Forrest, of the rebel service, to the Secretary of the Navy:

PAY DEPARTMENT,
NAVY-YARD, GOSPORT, May 26, 1861.

SIR: I have received from Paymaster E. C. Doran, of the Federal Navy, through Commander Thomas R. Rootes, of the Virginia navy, the net proceeds of two drafts on the sub-Treasurer at New York, one of $18,750, and one of $10,631.

Your explicit directions to me to apply this money to the purposes to which Paymaster Doran was himself instructed by the Navy Department at Washington to apply it, namely, to the payment of arrears due the employees of this yard and station to the 20th of April, ultimo, have been strictly complied with.

I hand you herewith pay-rolls of mechanics, &c., employed in this yard from the 1st to 15th of April, 1861, and from the 16th to 20th, amounting, in the aggregate, to $24,141 34. I also hand you a list of such officers on Mr. Doran's transfer-roll to whom payment has been made by me, (with the sums paid to each,) amounting to $3,125 49. There is quite a number of officers on this transfer-roll yet unpaid, and since, in its incomplete state, it would be useless to Paymaster Doran as a voucher in the settlement of his accounts, I have retained it until I can complete it, which I hope soon to accomplish.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. PETERS, Paymaster,
Flag-Officer F. FORREST,
Commander of Naval Station, Norfolk.

The following letters on the subject of the rolls were addressed by the Fourth Auditor to Paymaster Doran, and Hon. JOHN LAW of the House of Representatives:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, December 16, 1861.
SIR: In reply to your communication of the 14th instant, I desire to state that the rolls of the Norfolk yard, transmitted by yourself on the 15th of July last, are certified to by Mr. W. G. Webb, who was clerk of the yard to the 20th of April last. The official acknowledgment of their receipt bears the date of August 5.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOBART BERRIAN.
Paymaster E. C. DORAN, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, December 17, 1861.
SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 15th instant.

In compliance with the request therein contained, I beg to inclose the letter of Paymaster Edward C. Doran on the subject of the pay-rolls of the Norfolk navy-yard.

The sums disbursed on these rolls appear to have been for balances due for wages which had accrued prior to the abandonment of the yard, on the 20th of April last.

They are certified to by Mr. Webb, who was the authorized clerk of the yard.

I have the honor, sir, to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOBART BERRIAN.
Hon. JOHN LAW, House of Representatives.

The incomplete roll promised to be sent forward as soon as completed by William H. Peters has never been received, although Paymaster Doran, who made diligent inquiry by letter and in person, of parties in Norfolk, has been informed that all the rolls had been forwarded to Washington by Peters. As that roll either failed to arrive or has been mislaid, the exact amount paid on it cannot be ascertained.

The accounts, rolls, and vouchers for over one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, which were restored to Paymaster Doran after the surrender of his checks, have been formally audited and settled by the Treasury Department, while the informality, to wit, the said Peters, rebel paymaster, being an unauthorized agent of the United States, and the non-receipt of the one roll alluded to, prevent the settlement of Paymaster Doran's accounts from the 1st to 20th of April, 1861.

Having been frustrated, by events beyond his control, in making the payments to the employes of the Norfolk navy-yard, under the arrangement approved by the Secretary of the Navy, Paymaster Doran prays Congress for relief, by legalizing the payments and rolls and vouchers of William H. Peters for his benefit, and hopes that, in equity, under the following general order of the Navy Department of April 26, 1861, relating to balances due resigned officers of the seceded States, he is justified in asking for relief to the amount seized from him, believing that if the missing roll could be found it would appear that a large portion of the balance unaccounted for ($2,115 37) was paid.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 26, 1861.
SIR: The amounts found to be due to resigned officers from States which claim to have succeeded will heretofore be paid them from the United States funds heretofore sent to or deposited in those States, except in cases where the Department shall otherwise direct.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
GIDEON WELLES.
The Fourth Auditor of the Treasury.

The House bill No. 575 of last Congress authorizes the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit Paymaster Doran, in the settlement of his accounts, with the sum of $29,381. A letter addressed to a resigned officer by the Fourth Auditor shows that the order of the Navy Department of April 26, 1861, was adopted as a rule for the settlement of balances due by the United States to officers who joined the seceded States. Paymaster Doran states that he sustained private losses to the amount of twelve thousand to fifteen thousand dollars by the secession of Virginia and the abandonment of the navy-yard by our naval forces, and hopes the committee will take that fact into consideration in determining their action in his case.

It appeared to the committee that Paymaster Doran is entitled to the relief prayed for in his memorial, and they therefore report this accompanying bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

L. F. CARTEE.

Mr. HARDING: I move to take up Senate bill No. 19.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 19) for the relief of L. F. Cartee was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to pay to L. F. Cartee $3,033 50 for services performed in surveys of the public lands in Oregon in excess of his contract with the surveyor general of Oregon, dated October 14, 1860; but before any payment is made, the work performed by him is to be tested in the field by actual examination, under the direction of the surveyor general of Oregon, and any correction made necessary to make it conformable to the laws of the United States and the instructions governing the surveys of the public lands at his expense, and the balance only of the appropriation is to be paid him after deducting the expense of inspection and correction, if needed, and when the certificate of the surveyor general of Oregon is filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the survey is complete according to the law and regulations governing public surveys.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment in line twenty, after the word "correction," to strike out the words "if needed;" so that the clause will read:

And the balance only of said appropriation paid him after deducting said expenses of inspection and correction, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN L. BURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 1, a bill reported from the Committee on Pensions for the relief of John L. Burns. There is a very short report accompanying the bill, and if after its reading any Senator objects, I shall not ask for its present consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 1) granting a pension to John L. Burns, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John L. Burns, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, upon the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, for patriotic services at the battle of Gettysburg, where he was wounded on the 1st day of July, 1863, at which time the pension is to commence.

The Secretary read a report made by Mr. FOSTER from the Committee on Pensions, which shows that it appears from the evidence before the committee that John L. Burns was wounded at the battle of Gettysburg on Wednesday, the 1st day of July, 1863, soon after General Reynolds engaged the enemy. A few days previous to the battle he volunteered with other citizens to fell timber upon the mountain near Gettysburg, west of the town, for the purpose of obstructing the passes. On the morning of July 1, about ten o'clock, General Buford became engaged with the enemy's pickets between one and two miles from the town. Shortly after the first corps advanced to the support of General Buford, passing within sight of Burns's house on the double quick, Buford's skirmishers having been driven in. On seeing this advance Mr. Burns immediately seized an old musket and hastened to the battle-field. He fell into the ranks of the seventh Wisconsin regiment of the first brigade, honorably known as the "Iron brigade." Being challenged as to his purpose, having on citizen's dress, he made known his desire to fight the enemy, and some one handed him a rifle. Immediately thereafter the regiment came into action, and charged through a piece of woods into a small run. Here, however, the enemy rallied in superior force, and the regiment gradually fell back through the woods to a commanding slope, the Seminary Hill, in the rear of their former position. As they were emerging from the woods, Mr. Burns, in the act of firing upon a rebel in advance of the enemy's line, received a ball in his leg, which brought him to the ground, where he lay bleeding freely, unable to rise. As the first corps fell back to the heights south of the town, the field where Burns lay was occupied by the enemy. He remained where he fell all the night of July 1, and was carried by the rebels on the morning of the 2d to a house near the town, where he was recognized by the inmates and cared for, and at evening, by permission of the enemy, was taken to his own residence, which was used temporarily as a hospital by them, and here his wounds were dressed by a surgeon. It was then ascertained that he had received five wounds—one in his arm near the elbow, a flesh wound upon his hip, two contusions from spent balls, and the wound in his leg which disabled him. He was unaware of all these wounds except the last, but says that he previously felt a stinging sensation in his arm during the fight, and noticed the blood on his hand; but, supposing it a flesh-wound, kept on fighting, until the last wound brought him down and disabled him.

Mr. Burns is in the seventy-first year of his age; his wife is sixty-five, and in very feeble health. They have no children but an adopted daughter, about twenty years of age, who resides with them. Mr. Burns served in the war of 1812, and has volunteered twice in the present war; once in the company of Captain (now Colonel) C. H. Buckler, and once in the company of Captain E. McPherson, now Clerk of the House of Representatives; Captain Buckler thought him too old, and declined accepting him. He marched with Captain McPherson to Westchester, the rendezvous of the company, but failed to pass the surgical examination on account of age, and returned home. After being thus rejected from the military service, he joined General Banks's army in the autumn of 1861, then near the Potomac river, and did service through the fall and winter of 1861 and 1862 as a wagonmaster and teamster.

He is a man of exemplary character, commanding the respect of the community where he resides; and, although many years ago somewhat free in his habits as to drinking, he has for some twenty years past been a strictly temperate man, not having tasted liquor during that time. He has no means of support other than his daily labor, and although, owing to a vigorous constitution, he has in a great measure recovered from his wounds, yet, in the opinion of the committee, the granting of a pension is but an act of justice for gallant and patriotic services, and will furnish no dangerous precedent; they therefore recommend that this bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT BROWN.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 92.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to inquire whether there is a report upon that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. HOWE. I will state to the Senate what the bill is. There is a report accompanying the bill, which has been printed and has been laid on the tables of Senators, and I believe it was read at length when this bill was before the Senate the other day. The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. FOSTER) on that occasion offered some objections to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I will suggest to the Senator that I propose to make a motion in regard to this case, and I am willing to make it now or wait until he is through with his remarks, just as he pleases. I shall move that the claim be referred to the Court of Claims. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I will suggest that I shall make the motion now if he gives way for it.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose we may just as well have the motion made now. I have no objection to its being interposed now, but I shall have something to say on that motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, with the Senator's permission, I will make the motion now, and state briefly my reasons for it. This is a claim by a citizen of the United States on a contract made between him and the Government through the quartermaster's department; a written contract under which he was to furnish a given number of wagons for a given price under the circumstances stated in the contract. He claims that he has complied with the contract and has furnished the wagons, and that the Government has refused to pay him. It is therefore clearly a case which it is provided by law shall go to the Court of Claims, and it is not a proper case for the consideration of Congress, at least in the first instance. The law regarding the Court of Claims was revised at the last session, and in the second section of that act, which was approved March 3, 1863, it was provided:

"That all petitions and bills praying or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government, founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, shall, unless otherwise ordered by resolution of the House in which the same are presented or introduced, be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, with all the accompanying documents, to the court aforesaid."

That is, the Court of Claims. Now there is no case which by possibility can come before Congress more directly provided for by this section of the law than this present application of Mr. Brown. If we receive this case in the Senate, and consider it here, and send it to the other branch of Congress, and they consider it, there is certainly no reason on the earth why we should not thus entertain jurisdiction of every claim against the Government founded on any contract which has been or shall be made with the Government of the United States. If that be the case, at least so far as contracts are concerned, there is no occasion to have a Court of Claims, and we had better abolish it. If, on the other hand, it be deemed best that the law we have passed shall continue to be the law, and that the Court of Claims shall pass upon claims of this character, this claim surely, as well as others, should go there; and it is a claim which it seems to me ought for manifest reasons to go there.

This is a claim on a written contract. The party claims that there has been an entire performance of the contract on his part. It is a case which ought most especially to be examined in a court where testimony can be taken and is taken on both sides, and where the Government can be represented. Before a committee of this tribunal, or before a committee of the House of Representatives, no doubt a claim can be examined; but the Government is not represented, and the examination almost of course is ex parte. We may come to a fair, equitable, legal result; but it is surely better that we have both sides of a case presented rather than one. Before the Court of Claims both sides are presented. The party petitioning has his claim presented by himself or by counsel, sustained by his evidence. The Government is represented; it can present its side of the question and be represented by counsel. Before a committee of Congress that is not the case; and for that reason among others, as I suppose, this court was created by law. I think, therefore, that this case should go there, or else we certainly ought, as I have said, to entertain the jurisdiction of all claims of like character; and if we do that there is no occasion for the Court of Claims to exist; it is a useless incumbrance, a useless expense.

Mr. HOWE. I hope, Mr. President, that the motion submitted by the Senator from Connecticut will not be agreed to. I concede that the case provided for by this bill does come as clearly as any case can within the purview of the law just cited by the Senator; but the case also comes as clearly within the exception mentioned in that act as any case that can possibly be conceived of. The second section of the law cited provides:

"That all petitions and bills praying or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government, founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, shall, unless otherwise ordered by resolution of the House in which the same are presented or introduced, be transmitted by the Secretary;" &c.

That act was approved on the 3d of March, 1863, and this claim was then pending before the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator will pardon me: that is but a reenactment of an old law which has existed ever since the Court of Claims has existed. I only referred to this as a recent law. It did not change the then existing law in that particular.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator is mistaken. I have not the other act before me, and cannot point out the distinction, and it is not material. This claim was presented to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate have by resolution ordered otherwise, have ordered that it be referred to the Committee on Claims. It was referred to that committee in 1863, at the last session of Congress. The Committee on Claims reported a bill for the settlement of this claim and for the payment of this claim, and the Senate, I think by a unanimous vote, passed the bill. It did not pass the House of Representatives for want of time. Again it was presented to the Senate at the present session, and again by resolution of the Senate it was referred to the same committee, and that same committee have unanimously reported this bill the second time.

And now, Mr. President, I want to say in the outset that the Government of the United States has not issued a bond which more sacredly binds the Government to the payment of the sum of money than does the contract on which this claim is based; and if the Government will repudiate this claim, I know of no reason in honor which should preclude it from repudiating any bond it has issued.

The facts are simply these: a quartermaster in 1861 made a contract with Mr. Brown, the claimant, for the building of one hundred Army wagons. They were to be built within a very short space of time, and they were to be built according to specifications which were drawn up, reduced to writing, and signed by the contracting parties at the time. The wagons were built. The contract provided that the work should be inspected from time to time, as it progressed, by an officer or agent of the quartermaster's department; that none of it should be painted until it had been fully inspected by that officer or agent; that when finished, painted, and accepted by that agent and delivered as therein agreed, the wagons should be paid for. It then provided that the wagons, boxes, &c., should be stored at Kingston, New Hampshire, at such place as the quartermaster or his agent might designate, and the contractor was to assist in taking them apart for shipping. It was agreed that forty of the wagons complete should be ready for delivery on or before the 31st day of July, 1861, and the remainder on the 31st day of August, 1861.

An agent was appointed to examine these wagons as they were in process of construction. He attended to his work. He certifies that he did examine them, that he examined the timber which went into them, and he examined them fully before they were painted. He gave a certificate that they were completed and painted; that they were in accordance with the specifications. The Quartermaster General wrote to the builder to ship the wagons to Perryville, in the State of Maryland. They were shipped. When they reached Perryville an officer of the quartermaster's department reported to the Quartermaster General that they were not in accordance with the specifications.

Now, the committee say, as a matter of law, that it was too late for the Quartermaster General to refuse to receive those wagons after his agent appointed for that specific purpose had carefully examined them, had certified to their sufficiency, and upon that certificate the Quartermaster General had ordered the wagons to be shipped several hundred miles from the residence of the builder. I do not understand the Senator from Connecticut as controverting that proposition. He said it was a matter of some doubt. I will not undertake to say that any legal proposition can be submitted that is not open to some doubt; but if there be anywhere in the books a clear, unquestionable, indisputable legal proposition, I think the one submitted by the Committee on Claims is one of that class. When I have hired a mechanic to build me a house according to certain specifications, and the sufficiency of the house is to be determined by an agent of my own, and the mechanic has built the house, and my agent has certified that it complies with the specifications, with the terms of the contract, I think it is too late for me then to object to receiving the house and paying for it. So that, whether the wagons were in accordance with the specifications or not, the committee say, and I say again, it was too late for the Quartermaster General to refuse to pay for the wagons on that account.

But the committee have examined the evidence in this case, and they are decidedly and unanimously of opinion that the wagons were in accordance with the specifications, and that they were well built. The objection of the Quar-

master General was based upon the statement of a Captain Sawtelle of the quartermaster's department. He made two reports; and if there had been no other evidence in the case I am inclined to think the committee would have felt compelled to reject those reports as competent evidence, as evidence to be considered upon the question of the sufficiency of the wagons. There were two reports, as I say. They were contradictory of themselves. One contradicted the other. The quartermaster explained, that by saying that when he made the first inspection and report he had not the contract before him, and therefore did not know what the specifications were. Now, I think every Senator will say that before a quartermaster undertook to pass upon work of this kind, and to declare that it did not comply with the specifications of the contract, he ought to have known, and a prudent and careful officer would have taken the pains to know, what the specifications were; what the contract was. He says he did not. Subsequently he says he obtained the contract, ascertained what the specifications were, and then made a subsequent report; and in that subsequent report he undertook to say that the wagons, as they were constructed, did differ from the specifications. These two reports, contradicting each other, were the only evidence in the world which the Quartermaster General had before him on which to base his allegation that the work was not in accordance with the specifications. It was not the only evidence the committee had before them. They had the testimony of several competent witnesses, wagon-builders, men who had been engaged in doing just such work for the Government at different times, and who all certify to the good character of this work. The testimony of Captain Sawtelle is uncorroborated by any testimony whatever. The testimony of the agent of the quartermaster's department, who was specially appointed to examine this work, is corroborated by that of a great number of witnesses, and I wish the Senator from Connecticut would say, if he has taken pains to read the report, whether the weight of testimony does not sustain the allegation of the agent who made the first examination, and who was specially appointed to make an examination. I wish he would say if the testimony of Captain Sawtelle is not wholly uncorroborated.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman wish me to answer now?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I wish the Senator to answer now.

Mr. FOSTER. I say, from reading the report, I think the weight of testimony, as it appears on the papers, is in favor of the claim; but I have taken a little pains to inform myself somewhat further, (not much, it is true), and from additional evidence which has come to my mind, it is changed from what it would have been if I read only the report.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot be answerable for, and I cannot myself of course act upon the information which the Senator has been able to obtain outside of the papers in this case; but I wish to say that the Government was not represented before the committee. I wish to say that the chairman of the Committee on Claims called upon the Quartermaster General to inform the committee the reasons he had for disallowing this claim, and the Quartermaster General submitted to the committee, as the only reason upon which he acted and which influenced his conduct, these two reports from Captain Sawtelle. That is all the evidence he furnished to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—
Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senate would allow this case to be acted upon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will be argued here all day.

Mr. HOWE. Then, if it is to be, allow me to say—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it more important to pass the deficiency bill, for which many people are waiting.

Mr. HOWE. We shall wait the deficiency bill immediately afterwards I admit; but here is a mechanic who did this amount of work in 1861 and he is not paid for it yet, and I undertake to say that there is not an honest claim against any one of us nor against the Government than this is; and I undertake to say that it strikes me to be bearing a strong resemblance to a shame that such a claim should be allowed to linger so long.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is now before the Senate, being the unfinished business of Saturday.

MR. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that perhaps he had better let the claim go by for the present time. The Senate undoubtedly will give us an opportunity of hearing it when there is no deficiency bill and nothing else pressing, and a better opportunity perhaps. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the justice of the claim. I hope the Senate by and by will hear this claim as it ought to be heard. If we push it when the deficiency bill is pressing we should not get so full and candid a hearing as we ought.

MR. HOWE. I give way, but I do not like to have creditors kept outside of these Halls.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is joint resolution S. No. 23, to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

MR. FESSENDEN. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864.

MR. FESSENDEN. There is an error in one of the amendments submitted by me on Friday last which I should like to have corrected.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is one submitted by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

MR. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator will allow me to have the amendment corrected.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain it if there be no objection.

MR. FESSENDEN. It is the appropriation for the purchase of cavalry and artillery horses, which was written by mistake $17,500. It should be $17,500,000. That slight alteration is necessary. [Laughter.]

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so altered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The question now is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] to strike out the following clause:

For the compensation of the surveyor general of Arizona and the clerks in his office, $4,250.

MR. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Illinois suggested in support of his amendment that the surveyor general had not gone to that Territory and had not an office open there. I made inquiry at the General Land Office this morning and found that he had gone to the place for the establishment of the office and had established it. Therefore the proposition of the Senator from Illinois should not be adopted.

MR. HARLAN. The facts in relation to the case are about these: a year ago when an appropriation bill was pending containing an appropriation for the salary of the surveyor general of Arizona and other officers connected with that office, it was suggested in the Senate that the appropriation for surveys in that Territory amounted to about five thousand dollars; that the whole country had been included in the district of the surveyor general of New Mexico, and that that amount could be disbursed by him as advantageously after the organization of the new Territory of Arizona as before; that there would probably be no opportunity of engaging in public surveys in the Territory during the year; and further, that there was no necessity for the office; and on that statement the Senate struck out the appropriation.

The facts are as was contemplated at the time; there have been no surveys either in New Mexico or Arizona during the year, and no necessity whatever for the office. I understand that the gentleman who was appointed when he came on here to solicit the office was told that there was no appropriation to pay the salary, that no surveys were contemplated, that there was no necessity for his services, and yet he insisted on being appointed, and suggested that he would run his hazard about getting an appropriation to pay the salary. It seems to me it is a case that ought to be met squarely. In possession of all the facts, Congress last year refused to make an appropriation to pay the salary, on the ground that there was no necessity for the office, that no work of that kind could be done during the year, and it seems to me if a case can be presented that is strong enough to induce us to reject a deficiency, this is one.

THE VICE PRESIDENT put the question, and declared that the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL was rejected.

MR. JOHNSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library—

MR. FOSTER. I doubt whether the attention of the Senate was called to the last vote. I wish that question may be put again. It is the fault of the Senate, certainly, and not of the Chair.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question, if there was misunderstanding. The question is on striking out the words which were read, being lines sixty-eight, sixty-nine, and seventy, containing an appropriation for the surveyor general of Arizona.

MR. ANTHONY. It seems to me that if there have not been any surveys made in Arizona there ought to be some made. Why are not surveys going on there as well as in other Territories? I was not at all satisfied last session with our striking out the appropriation. I think the land there ought to be surveyed. The Territory ought to be treated as the other Territories are. The Senator from Iowa says that a man came here and insisted upon being appointed to the office. A great many men have insisted on being appointed to office; but I do not think they can get office unless they have a nomination by the President and the confirmation of this body. If the President has appointed an officer and we have confirmed him, it seems to me it is rather too late for us to say we will not pay him.

MR. HARLAN. I am not sure that the officer has been confirmed. The Commissioner of the General Land Office says in his report that the appointment was made by the President, and that the appointee started for his field of labor some time in July, since which he has not heard from him. The reasons why surveys have not been made there, I suppose, are as manifest to the Senator from Rhode Island as to every one else. It is owing to the condition of the country, the hostility of the Indians and of guerrillas, who have had possession of Arizona ever since its organization.

MR. ANTHONY. But was not the office of surveyor general authorized by the law? Was not the President authorized to appoint him? If the President was authorized to appoint him and did appoint him, ought we not to pay him? He has gone out there. The Senator from Indiana says he has gone. He went in July, I think.

MR. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

MR. ANTHONY. If the Senate had stricken out, not the appropriation for the office, but the office itself, we should have no trouble; but here we authorize the appointment of an officer; the President appoints him and sends him out to attend to his duties; and because we think on the whole it is an unnecessary office, we will not pay him.

MR. TRUMBULL. The law expressly provided that he should not be paid.

MR. ANTHONY. I think not.

MR. TRUMBULL. Certainly it did, until he entered upon the discharge of his duty.

MR. ANTHONY. But he has entered upon the discharge of his duty.

MR. TRUMBULL. No; there is no evidence of it.

MR. JOHNSON. The law does prohibit any payment being made until the officer gets there; but I understand the officer is now on his way there, and if he gets there and discharges the duty of the office, from the time he gets there he ought to be paid, and he cannot be paid unless there is an appropriation in advance.

MR. ANTHONY. Precisely. I do not desire that he shall be paid before he gets there; and I suppose he cannot be, under this appropriation.

MR. JOHNSON. He cannot be paid under this appropriation until he shows that he is entitled to be paid under the law creating the office. All that the appropriation does is to set apart in the Treasury a fund with which to pay him when he becomes entitled to payment; that is all.

MR. ANTHONY. Then there can be no objection to the appropriation.

MR. GRIMES. Then there is no deficiency, and it ought not to be put in this bill.

MR. JOHNSON. Certainly there is a deficiency. You are providing for an office for which you promised to pay say $2,000. The gentleman who is to go into the office enters on his duties two or three months hence, and you will not be in session. Is he to go without pay until you meet again?

MR. TRUMBULL. I wish to say a word in addition to what I said the other day upon this appropriation. The Arizona bill provides that "No salary shall be due or paid to the officers created by this act until they have entered on the duties of their respective offices within the said Territory."

Now, we have no evidence of their having entered upon the discharge of their duties within the Territory.

MR. FESSENDEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? Suppose that intelligence satisfactory to the Land Office or to the accounting officers is received that in fact they did arrive and enter upon the discharge of their duties last November or December; if we make no appropriation there will be no fund out of which to pay their salaries from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties. If no such evidence is received of their entering upon the discharge of their duties before the expiration of the fiscal year, of course the money will not be paid. This is only providing a fund out of which they may be paid if they have complied with the law, and the presumption is that they either have entered or will enter upon the discharge of their duties before the close of the year.

MR. TRUMBULL. I think it will be time enough to provide for paying them when we ascertain that they are in a position to claim the salary; but at any rate the Senator from Maine will see that no such sum as four thousand and odd dollars can be due this surveyor general under any state of case from now to June. I do not remember his salary; I suppose it was fixed at $2,000. His salary is but $2,000 for a whole year, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] informs me. Here you propose to appropriate upward of four thousand dollars to pay him between now and June.

MR. FESSENDEN. For himself and clerks.

MR. TRUMBULL. It is very manifest that no such sum as that can be due; and now when such vast appropriations are being made, and when my friend from Maine is such a close custodian of the Treasury, I am a little surprised that he should want to swell the appropriations larger than can possibly be necessary. This officer did not start until July, at any rate, and I think I have seen an account in some of the papers that later than that, some time in August, he had not gone to Arizona and was not in Arizona. It seems to me that a portion of the appropriation at least should be stricken out.

MR. FESSENDEN. How much?

MR. TRUMBULL. Certainly there cannot be a year's service to pay for.

MR. FESSENDEN. I suppose this appropriation is made on the basis of a year for himself and his clerks; but the law is perfectly plain; he can only be paid from the time he entered on the duties of his office. We cannot tell now when he did enter upon the discharge of his duties; we know nothing about it; and I suppose the Secretary of the Interior recommended the appropriation of the sum to which he and his clerks would be entitled by law, provided he entered upon the discharge of his duties at the beginning of the fiscal year; and the Secretary did not undertake to guess at what time he arrived, because there is no danger about it. Under the act he can only be paid for a specific time; and if we appropriate more than enough, the money that is not paid to him goes into the surplus fund of the Treasury. His account must be audited under the act already passed.

MR. TRUMBULL. That argument is the one which I tried to meet the other day. It is true this is not a very large sum; but now the chairman of the Finance Committee takes the ground that if more money is appropriated than is necessary, it will not be expended. Suppose we act upon that principle in regard to all the appropriations, what does the check of Congress over the money of the people amount to? If we appropriate $40,000,000 for a particular object, and in the opinion of the men who disburse it only $30,000,000 is necessary, they will only expend $30,000,000; and what is the harm in it? If to pay the judicial expenses of the Government, to pay the expenses of our foreign ministers and consuls abroad, we appropriate $5,000,000 and the Government only has occasion to use $4,000,000, the rest of it will remain in the Treasury. Why should we trouble ourselves with details and with looking to see what is the necessary appropriation to pay the officers created by law? Why make any calculation about it? No more will be paid than the law allows, and we may just as well lump it and be sure to appropriate enough to pay all these expenses, and of course the disbursing officers will pay out no more than is proper!

If that argument is a sound one, of course the Finance Committee and this body and Congress will be relieved from any supervision over the Treasury, except to be sure and make appropriations big enough to cover everything. I submit, is that the kind of care that Congress should exercise over the Treasury? Is that what is meant by prohibiting money being drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law?

It is very manifest that when the law to create the Territory of Arizona was passed it was passed under the impression that it was to be no expense to the Government to establish that Territory unless the officers went there and discharged their duties in the Territory. I know that at the time the bill creating the Territory of Arizona was up I opposed it upon this very ground, and I think the Senator from Maine concurred with me, though I am not sure about that. I think he voted with me against the bill; but Congress thought proper to pass it. I have nothing to say now about the creation of the Territory, but Congress passed it with this provision in the law. As we have positive evidence in the official reports that the whole appropriation for a year cannot be due to this officer, it seems to me we ought not to make the whole appropriation for the year.

Again, I should like to know whether appropriations are made in this bill for attorneys and marshals and judges and all the officers in Arizona. I see nothing in this deficiency bill for any officers there except the surveyor general. Let me inquire of the Finance Committee why the bill does not embrace an appropriation for the Governor and judges? They have been appointed.

Mr. ANTHONY. An appropriation was made to pay them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that that was so.

Mr. ANTHONY. The appropriation for surveyor general was not made because it was not supposed the man would be appointed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have confirmed no surveyor general, as I understand. There has been no person who has received the confirmation of the Senate, and this appointment was made, I believe, after the Senate adjourned. That would not prevent his being entitled to his pay, I agree, if he has gone to the Territory and is discharging his duties.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I do not see any difficulty. The Senator from Illinois is willing that the surveyor general shall be paid from the time he went there and entered upon his duties. That is all he can be paid under the appropriation contained in the bill. If the amount contained in the clause is not correct, and if the Senator from Illinois can tell what the proper amount is, I am perfectly willing to have it cut down to the precise sum necessary; but I am not willing that a man shall be appointed by the President under the law and go out there, and then that you shall refuse to give him his pay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is for the committee to know the precise amount. I am not on the Finance Committee; perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island is.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not, but I take the amount from the committee. Perhaps that amount is too large. It may be. If the committee have made a mistake I am willing to have the appropriation cut down to the proper amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By referring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, I find that the surveyor general left Fort Craig, in New Mexico, for Arizona on the 9th of July last, and that on the 31st of the same month he was in the Territory and visiting different localities to select a place for his office, so that by the 1st of July it will not be very far from a year since he was on the spot, and actually in the discharge of his duties, if I read this report aright.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How would he be entitled to four thousand dollars and upward for a year?

Mr. FESSENDEN. For his clerks and the expenses of the office.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to see the law that allows an appropriation for the clerks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They all have clerks. They cannot get along without them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not in the act creating the Territory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The clause is "for compensation of the surveyor general and the clerks in his office, $4,250." We allow clerks in all these offices.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Under what law?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot speak of the law particularly. I know it is the practice. I have not examined this matter minutely to ascertain about it; but it having passed the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, he having recommended it, and it having passed through the Committee of Ways and Means and of the House of Representatives, I supposed that the estimates were made rightly. This is according to an estimate sent in. I do not know how much precisely is required.

I do not exactly understand my honorable friend from Illinois. He seems to argue all these questions precisely as if he was before some public meeting out in Illinois attacking the Administration, where there is nobody to reply and where they do not understand the manner in which this business is done. I think that is hardly a fair way of presenting it. The Senator knows very well that it is impossible for us to ascertain precisely how everything is to be done. He goes upon the presumption that every officer in all the Departments, every accounting officer, is a rascal and will disobey the law, and that there is no honesty anywhere except in himself, or at least no sufficient degree of honesty and of looking after the public business on the part of any one else. I cannot understand it in any other way, because he is attacking the mode in which business has been done from the foundation of the Government, and must be done. We cannot ascertain to a certainty in a great many cases exactly how much money is necessary to meet a particular contingency. This is one of those cases, and the difficulty arises from the fact that we do not know when the man entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office under the law. But a question of that kind comes to the accounting officer always, and it is to be presumed, to say the least, that the accounting officer will do his duty in scrutinizing the account. The question of money not being drawn from the Treasury except under an appropriation made by law does not arise. We make the appropriation; but it does not follow from that that all the money we appropriate for a given purpose is necessarily to be drawn out of the Treasury, unless it is due when the account is stated.

For myself, I believe that the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, both under this Administration and previous Administrations, have always been stringent and careful in examining the accounts presented. The complaint has been that they have been too stringent and too careful and too minute, and raised too many technical objections, rather than that they allowed too much. Undoubtedly there are to be found in all large bodies of men some who are subject to temptation and are not honest; but as a general rule the accounting officers, in my judgment, are honest men and do their duty strictly, and perhaps as strictly as the public interests require.

Now, sir, let the people understand in connection with this attack made by the honorable Senator, that here we appropriate the money that we find the law requires us to appropriate in order to carry out certain purposes of the Government. We can go no further than that. We may examine, and if the sum is too much cut it down; but it does not follow that all the money that is appropriated is necessarily to be paid out. The object is, in order to prevent any obstacle in the way of effecting the public service, to appropriate enough to accomplish the purpose. If that money is earned under the law, the accounting officers will allow and pay it. If it is not earned under the law, it will not be paid but will remain in the Treasury, and no harm is done. Money is not taken out of the Treasury simply by appropriating it, because if the contingency does not arise, if the service is not rendered, it remains in the Treasury; it is just as good for our purposes as if we had not made an appropriation. We pass thousands of appropriations, I was about to say, to be paid "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." It is there in mass; if not drawn it remains there, and there is no harm done. It is very common with the honorable Senator to make these attacks upon the Committee on Finance, as if they did not do their duty, as if they did not look into things, as if they did not know enough minutely. I have the highest respect for my honorable friend, for his intelligence and for his integrity, and I do wish that he stood in my place, that he was chairman of the Committee on Finance. If he were we should have the expenses of this Government figured out to a copper in every particular, and everything placed in such minute, pimlico order that everybody could understand exactly what it was in every respect, because the complaint he makes of the Committee on Finance is that it is not so done. I only say that with the limited capacity I am enabled to bring to the investigation of questions I am perfectly unable, and any other man, even he, would be unable, to ascertain to a shilling how every appropriation is to be made and how it is to be paid. The thing is impossible in the nature of things. We must, after all, trust to those persons who are appointed to administer another branch of the Government—I mean those who look and see that the accounts are properly kept and then pay them. We have nothing to do with the payment of money. If we appropriate $1,000 or $5,000 too much in a particular instance by accident, as we may do, and perhaps as we frequently do—I cannot tell how that is; I hope it is not the case, however, and I do not think it is—it does not follow that the Treasury is injured or that the money is to be paid out. In such a case all the money cannot be drawn unless there is dishonesty or blundering in the statement of the accounts for which the particular sum may be appropriated. That is the fact, and I think it may as well be understood so. It is one thing to get up here to find fault and another thing to correct the fault. If in this case the honorable Senator will undertake to say when this officer did get there, when he entered upon the discharge of his duties, what the legal amount of his expenses is, and cut the appropriation down to that, we shall all vote for such an amendment; but if he cannot tell, if he cannot correct it, let us not strike out the whole when the man is there, and when if he is not there he will not be paid under the law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am sorry that an attempt to call attention to this item in the appropriation bill should have been so unpleasant to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say to my friend if he will allow me to explain, that it is not to the attempt to call attention to it that I object, but to his iterated and reiterated attacks upon the Committee on Finance for their looseness and carelessness in the examination of these bills, of which he does not know anything himself except to find fault.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I admit that I know very little in regard to the financial operations of the Government, and less as to the action of the Finance Committee. I have the greatest confidence in its ability, and feel very grateful to that committee for the care with which it ordinarily watches over the Treasury. The Senator from Maine is very much mistaken if he supposes that I designed to make any attack either upon the Committee on Finance or upon the Government, or if he supposes that I charged every officer of the Government with dishonesty, or presumed that every officer of the Government was dishonest, or if he supposes that I set up any peculiar claims for honesty on my part. These are all imaginations on the part of the Senator from Maine. I have very great confidence in the honesty and the integrity of the officers of the Government, as a general thing, and have very great confidence in the ability and integrity and the superior knowledge of the Committee on Finance, especially of its chairman; and I will not reply to him in the spirit that he manifested when he said that I know nothing about such things. I admit that I know altogether less about such things than he does, and I am willing to admit that he possesses very great knowledge about them; but still here happens to be an appropriation for one single item that the Senate generally, I suppose, can understand, and all of us can understand when attention is called to it.

I find by looking at the report of the Secretary of the Interior that he estimates for the compensation of the surveyor general of Arizona, (and refers to the act of February 24, 1863, 12 Statutes at Large, page 665, section 2), the sum of $2,250; and for the compensation of the clerks in the office of the surveyor general, $2,000. The act referred to makes no provision for clerks at all. I did inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance as I supposed he had superior information on the subject, and I wanted to be informed what the law was in regard to clerks. I confessed my ignorance in regard to it. I had not looked into the statutes. I did know, I happened to recollect, that when we passed the bill to organize the Territory of Arizona, it was the understanding that the officers were not to be paid until they went there and entered upon the discharge of their duties. I was not aware that there was any law allowing clerks to the surveyor general; I am not aware now that there is. But if we pass this appropriation bill in the shape in which it comes to us we make an appropriation for the payment of clerks there, and undoubtedly clerks will be employed if there is money appropriated for their payment.

The salary of the surveyor general, as I am informed by my friend, the chairman on Public Lands, [Mr. HARLAN,] is $2,000 a year. The sum estimated here is $2,250. If I thought it would not be an offense I would really like to inquire of the Senator from Maine how it is possible that $2,250 can be needed to pay until June next an officer who, the same report states, had not reached Arizona in July last. If we were to appropriate enough to pay the salary for a year, that certainly would cover the whole of it, and reach until the 1st of July next; and then the sum needed could be but $2,000 by possibility, if the salary is $2,000 and we appropriate it for the year. It is not a large sum, it is true, and I am not disposed to take up time in regard to it; but I did not wish the Senator to suppose that I acted in a fault-finding spirit with anybody, as I certainly would not with him, at any rate. I know that the labors of his committee are very great; I know he is very exact in the reports which he makes from the committee, and in common with the Senate and the whole country I feel under great obligations to him for the care with which he scrutinizes these appropriation bills. I only regret that my calling attention to a small matter in this bill should have led him to suppose that it was in a spirit of fault-finding with him or with anybody else. The only object I had was to correct the appropriation in reference to this item if it was wrong; and if not, to ascertain that it was right, and then let it pass as it was.

I think the principle which the Senator laid down, that we should appropriate a gross sum and leave it to the Department to use the money or not, is an improper principle upon which to legislate. I think it would be wrong to appropriate a larger amount to pay the salaries of the Government officers than they would amount to by a computation. I have no doubt the committee does see to that, and takes care that we do not appropriate a sum without examination and leave it to the officers to pay out the proper amount. What I understand by our appropriation bills is that we see that they are based upon acts of Congress or upon estimates which will require the amount that we appropriate. That is all that I desire in this case.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the proposition susceptible of amendment now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. GRIMES. I move then to strike out the sum now in the clause and to substitute $2,000. That will pay the surveyor general his salary and will leave nothing for the clerks. As I understand it, there have been no surveys made in that district, and there is no probability of any surveys being made there very soon. There are no records to take care of, and there is no necessity for any clerical force whatever. We got ourselves into a scrape by authorizing the creation of the office, and I do not see that we can get out of it otherwise than by paying the salary we agreed to pay; but I do not think there is any law that authorizes the appointment of clerks, and I do not see that there is any necessity for clerks being appointed. I therefore move to reduce the sum to $2,000 and strike out the clerks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I find this appropriation estimated for on page 151 of the estimates: "For compensation of the surveyor general of the Territory of Arizona, per act February 24, 1863, $3,000." And then, "For compensation of his clerks, $4,000." That is based upon the act organizing the Territory of Arizona; and I am surprised that the Senator from Illinois should say to the Senate that he is not able to see any authority of law for the employment of clerks in that surveyor general's office. It would have been a very singular thing if Congress had recognized an office of that sort without allowing clerks to aid the surveyor general. The second section of the act, on page 665 of volume twelve of the Statutes at Large, provides:

"There shall also be a secretary, a marshal, a district attorney, and a surveyor general, for said Territory, who, together with the Governor and judges of the supreme court, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of office for each, the manner of their appointment, and the powers, duties, and compensation of the Governor, Legislative Assembly, judges of the supreme court, secretary, marshal, district attorney, and surveyor general aforesaid, with their clerks, draughtsmen, deputies, and sergeant-at-arms, shall be such as are conferred upon the same officers by the act organizing the territorial government of New Mexico;" &c.

So that we shall have to refer to the act organizing the territorial government of New Mexico to see what number of clerks are allowed, and at what compensation, if that law is the law governing this case. It does not devolve on me, sir, to vindicate the integrity or the intelligence of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but when he sends in an estimate it is fair to presume that the facts do exist under the law which authorize the expenditure of the money. The law provides that there shall no salary be due to the surveyor general or to his clerks until they are upon the ground and have entered upon the discharge of their duties; and when the Commissioner of the General Land Office sends in his estimates it is fair to presume that the facts justify the estimates, that the officers have entered in fact upon the discharge of the duties of their offices; and I should not go beyond these estimates on the question of fact whether they had entered on the discharge of their duties under this law, because until they had so entered, the Commissioner could not make an estimate for their salaries. But I am also informed at that office that they have gone to that Territory, and of course I shall vote for their payment.

I do not undertake to go back and question the propriety of the passage of the law organizing the territorial government of Arizona or establishing a surveyor general's office therein. I do not suppose that if I had been a member of this body at that time I should have voted for the law; I do not think it is very important for the public interests that there should be such an office in that Territory. But it is provided for by law; the surveyor general has gone to the place where his duties are to be discharged; the estimates are sent in; and I think we have but little to do except to vote for the estimates. And I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the appropriation proposed in this bill is now much below the estimate of the Commissioner. It is only $4,250. This will allow but the employment of a very small clerical force; and any one acquainted with the business of a surveyor general's office knows that there must be clerks of very considerable skill and knowledge, there must be draughtsmen, and the corps of clerks necessarily is considerable. I suppose that this appropriation is a very small one, and I will agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] if he thinks that this surveyor general ought not to be continued, that we should take hold of the thing and dispose of it; that is, repeal the law creating the office, or consolidate that office with some other. If he says that is right and proper, I shall go with him for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to modify his amendment so as to put in the amount reported by the committee, and add, "or so much thereof as may be necessary." Nobody wants to appropriate more than is necessary to pay for the actual service. I suppose everybody is willing to pay for that. I supposed those words were unnecessary; but still Senators seem to be apprehensive that under the appropriation the accounting officers will pay money for services not rendered. I do not think it is at all necessary to add the words I have suggested, but I think it would meet the objections of Senators.

Mr. GRIMES. I would be willing to do it, but we all know that this is to pay for no service, but to reward a man who has rendered some political service to somebody and been sent out to Arizona.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know who the surveyor general is. There was a man appointed from my State, and his appointment was withdrawn because there was no appropriation made. I will say here that I expected that when an appointment was made it would be made from the State of Rhode Island; but some one has been appointed, I do not know who he is, and he has gone out there.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the State of Rhode Island was very badly served because the appointee was not taken from that State, for I believe the State of Rhode Island has special and particular interests in Arizona, her people owning some of the mines there.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so too.

Mr. GRIMES. It was greatly through that influence that this Territory was created and these officers put as a burden on the Treasury.

Mr. ANTHONY. But because the State of Rhode Island has been badly treated by not giving us the surveyor, I am not therefore in favor of treating badly the man who was appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.]

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now returns on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, to strike out the clause.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance have instructed me to offer an amendment, after line two hundred and twenty-three to insert:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for Capitol police for the Senate, $4,300 75.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for stationery for the Senate, $6,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for miscellaneous items for the Senate, $20,000.

I wish to say a word upon these items. In regard to the first two, I take it there is no objection to them, and I do not know that there is to the last. The first is to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of the Capitol police, and that arises from our own legislation in increasing their compensation twenty per cent., and making no appropriation for the increased compensation. The next is a deficiency for stationery, which arises, as I am told, from the increased price of stationery since last year, the original estimates being made somewhat upon the old prices. The third item is for a deficiency in the "miscellaneous items," so called, of the contingent fund of the Senate. There is already an absolute deficiency; that is to say, there are bills due amounting to something over ten thousand dollars, and which bills have not been paid, as I understand; and then there is a very considerable portion of the time from now until the 1st of July left to provide for.

I suppose the sum is small enough. I do not know how that is, however. It is not so large as was at first proposed, and we must necessarily, as in other cases, form the best estimate we can from what has previously taken place. But, sir, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, in my judgment, there is some legislation necessary by way of check upon the expenditure of money in the Senate and connected with the Senate. There is either some legislation necessary, or it is essential that the legislation we have had should be enforced. My attention has been called to the fact that for the last three sessions we have had every year large deficiency bills for contingent expenses in the Senate, and also in the House of Representatives; but of that they must take care themselves. One time we appropriated $30,000 deficiency. The amount called for this year was much larger than we propose to appropriate. Two or three items were left out because we had not sufficient information on which to predicate an opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the aggregate amount asked for now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. About thirty thousand dollars. Twenty thousand dollars of it is for these miscellaneous items; the other $10,000 is absolutely necessary. In the way the thing is done, in fact, there is great liability to abuse. The Secretary of the Senate keeps the money, but he has nothing to do with the expenditure of it. The Sergeant-at-Arms, for instance, expends the money in some cases, and other officers do it in other cases. The Sergeant-at-Arms contracts at his discretion for the purchase of articles of furniture and repairs of furniture, and different things for the Capitol, and he approves the bills, and all the Secretary or the cashier has to do is to pay the bills. In one instance I inquired of the cashier how it had been done: he is recently in his office, and I do not think any fault comes upon him. This appropriation is for money absolutely paid, in some instances overpaid, more than the amount appropriated. I asked him how that was done. His reply was that it is paid out of some other fund and then made up by a deficiency. That is all wrong. The books, in my judgment, should be kept in such a way as to show how every particular fund appropriated is used; and when the officer gets to the end of an appropriation for a particular fund he should stop paying and not go to another fund at discretion and pay out of that.

I think there should be an additional check upon the expenditure. Now, when an officer exercises his discretion and approves the bills, the money is paid simply upon that. There should always be a check upon him. A bill should be properly investigated, or we should in some way be assured of its correctness, before it is paid. I am not throwing any imputation on anybody; but the Senate will see that from the manner in which the fund has been managed it is necessarily liable to very considerable abuse.

I make the remarks that I do now so as to call the attention of the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to the subject, in order that they may if necessary provide some legislation with regard to it. As it is, as a general rule, as I understand the accounts that are rendered for these contingent expenses, the payments are not examined by the committee until after the bills have absolutely been paid, and then they are exhibited to the committee for their approval. It may not be so in all instances, but it has been in a great many. What the remedy should be the Committee on Finance have had no time to examine, and I do not know that it is their business to provide checks in this matter: it properly belongs to other committees to do that. It is evident to me at least that the thing is wrongly managed as it is, and I am tired of having these very large deficiencies in our own Chamber come in at every session of Congress. At any rate, I think the matter should be properly investigated.

Mr. CLARK. As a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, perhaps it is right that I should say something in regard to the contingent fund. I do not know that the chairman of the Committee on Finance intends to cast any reflection upon the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I do not suppose that he does. That committee, however, have been very careful in regard to the expenditure of that fund; but there are some things which are beyond the control of the committee, and in regard to which additional legislation is required. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that bills are paid out of the fund, over which we have no control in the first outset. They are approved by some officer of the Senate whose duty it is to contract the debt, and then they go to the Secretary of the Senate, and by his clerk are paid under that approval; and we have nothing to do except to audit the account after it has been paid, examine the voucher, and see that the voucher corresponds with the account. But a practice has grown up here which I think is entirely wrong, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it, and to what the Committee on Contingent Expenses have done; and that is a matter which was referred to by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. There is a practice of paying a bill, say, for instance, under the "miscellaneous" head, out of any fund set apart for any other particular purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that done?

Mr. CLARK. The committee thought that they had put an end to it, but it seems they have not. I am told it has been the practice for years. At the last session of Congress, the attention of a committee then, which is the present committee, was called to that practice, and they told the Secretary of the Senate, or rather his clerk, that it must not be done further, because in the judgment of the committee it was entirely without authority of law. For instance, Mr. President, you set apart a fund for the payment of Senators, and I am told that they go to that fund to pay for miscellaneous items, if they have any of it left. I am charging no fault upon anybody, because it has been the practice. The committee thought they had put an end to it by calling the attention of the Secretary of the Senate and of his clerk to it and expressing their disapprobation of that practice; but I find that it has been continuing through all the summer. There can be no security for any portion of that fund if it is allowed to be exhausted in that way. But I understand, and I ought to say for the present clerk of the Secretary of the Senate, that he had not any knowledge of such action on the part of the committee, and I presume now it will be at once checked by calling his attention to it. We shift the clerks, and the one going out does not communicate his knowledge to the one coming in, and so a practice obtains and continues which ought not to exist. It may be necessary to have legislation on the subject to check it, but I think it will be checked on the suggestion of the committee now. I hope it will. Otherwise a resolution must be brought into the Senate to check such a practice, for I think it is entirely wrong.

Then, again, the committee undertook at the last session to put some restriction on the payment of these bills, and they passed a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-Arms, for instance, that no purchase of new furniture should be made unless it was absolutely necessary. With that provision of the committee and that resolution, the committee are bound to say the Sergeant-at-Arms in their opinion has complied and has shown a disposition to comply; but the committee went further and provided that whenever a bill was presented to the Sergeant-at-Arms for his approval and payment, or to the Secretary of the Senate for his approval and payment, a certain oath should be taken by the party presenting it. I will read to the Senate the nature of the oath, the form of the oath prescribed, so that the Senate may see that the committee have not been in fault about this matter, their attention having been called to it:

"Resolved, That bills and accounts presented to the committee for allowance or to the Secretary of the Senate for payment must be proved to be correct by the oath of the claimant, or some disinterested person in his behalf who knows the facts, in the manner following: I, A. B., do solemnly swear that the foregoing account is correct and just; that the labor was actually and faithfully performed, and the whole of the articles named in said account were furnished as stated; that the prices charged for such labor and articles are reasonable, and as low as they are furnished by regular dealers to private individuals in Washington, and that no officer of the Government has been or will ever be directly or indirectly benefited because of my being employed to furnish the labor and articles named in this account."

That is the oath which the committee required to be taken in every case of account; but owing to the shifting of the clerk there, I am sorry to say it has not been done. There are, however, reasons why a deficiency may exist, and why the sum allowed should be increased. It is the same in regard to the contingent fund as to all other funds of the Government in times of excitement and war; they want more money than they do at other times; as, for instance, this body raised a committee and gave to that committee power to send for persons and papers; the money necessary is paid out of this fund, which was not contemplated when the appropriation for it was made. On account of one committee raised this year, there has already been paid out of that fund $1,000, and so these deficiencies come up.

I desire to say that I do not know of any wrong payment out of the fund; I do not know that anybody has done intentional wrong; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the action of the committee and to the practices that have obtained, so that the Senate may know what the committee are doing to stop those practices and to bring the fund to a regular and proper administration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this difficulty has grown out of the action of Congress four or five years ago in passing a joint resolution withdrawing the expenditure of the contingent fund from the supervising action of the accounting officers of the Treasury. A question of dignity then arose between the two Houses and Comptroller Whittlesey. Comptroller Whittlesey rejected certain accounts of the House of Representatives, and the joint resolution to which I have referred was introduced on the ground that it was beneath the dignity of either House to submit its contingent accounts to the Comptroller of the Treasury. Since that time there has been a great deal more latitude in expenditure, and the expenditures have been very largely increased.

There is another difficulty in the way. Accounts are presented and are paid without being audited by any committee of either House. The Sergeant-at-Arms buys furniture; those accounts are presented to the paying teller and are paid without having passed the scrutiny of the committee of which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] is a member.

Mr. CLARK. I must correct the Senator in that respect. We scrutinize the accounts before they are paid. I must say, in justice to the Sergeant-at-Arms, that he submits them to us and states them carefully.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must state that we had this morning this very teller before us, and he told us distinctly that he paid these accounts before they were examined by the committee, and then sent them to the committee, and that they were examined by the committee after they were paid. The question was put to him distinctly, "Suppose accounts are rejected, what then?" "Why, we have to collect them back." That was the information we had this morning.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know but that may have been so in some instances, but what I mean is that the accounts are presented to us for scrutiny, and then we approve them. We did not suppose they were paid before presentation to us. If that is so, if they are paid before we have approved them, then the presentation of them to us is a mere farce, and it ought to be corrected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that we had that information directly from the paying teller this morning, that his accounts were paid solely on the certificate of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or whoever may be the contracting officer, and did not await the action of the committee before they were paid. He says that under the law and under the practice existing for years, that habit has grown up that they are paid before examination by the committee; and not only that, if there is no balance in the Treasury belonging to the particular item of the contingent fund applicable to the bills, they are still paid out of other appropriations, so that there is no check. This appropriation is intended to cover a deficiency of some $10,000. The paying teller has, in accordance with the custom, as he says, continued to pay these accounts; but the appropriation has been exhausted, and upon being inquired of out of what money he paid it, he said he paid it out of other appropriations disbursed by him, moneys being drawn from the Treasury on other appropriations in his hands, and he continued to pay them. It seems to me this ought to be checked; and I will state that I made a proposition to the Committee on Finance, but they thought it was better to come from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, to add this proviso:

Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House unless the amount is fixed by law, or the account is first audited by the proper committee.

That would require all the contingent accounts to be laid over until the committee can convene and pass upon them, and then upon their approval they may be paid. This would not extend to the pay of clerks and other employes whose compensation is fixed by law; but as to all contingent items, as furniture, repairs, and contingencies of that kind, the accounts ought to be presented to the committee, and not paid until they are properly audited; but I will offer my amendment for the purpose of bringing the subject to the attention of the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio propose to attach it to the amendment pending?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; as a proviso.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio proposes to amend the amendment by adding a proviso which will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House unless the amount is fixed by law, or the account is first audited by the proper committee.

Mr. CLARK. This bill is in committee, and I suggest to the Senator that he let the amendment lie over until the bill comes into the Senate, and I will then try to perfect it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw it for that purpose. I will state to the Senate another difficulty. Many of these bills come in during the recess, and it is said that it is a hardship for the creditors to wait until the Senate meets. It seems to me it is better for them to suffer that hardship than to have no supervision over these accounts.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to say in regard to that, that the committee at the last session directed that none of the bills should be paid during the vacation. It had been the practice to send these bills around to the Senators at their homes to be approved by the committee one after another. I called the attention of the committee to it as a practice which ought not to obtain, and the committee directed that the bills should be approved by the committee when in session, and at no other time, and we also directed that bills should not be paid during the vacation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Still they have been paid.

Mr. CLARK. It seems we have not had quite force enough.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. For the purpose of eliciting an explanation of the second section of this bill, I move to strike out in the tenth line, after the word "law," all that there is in that section: that which relates to a new Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The first part of the section authorizes the creation of a Second Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and gives him a salary of $3,000. To that I have no objection, if it be deemed necessary that there should be another Assistant Secretary in that Department. Then the section goes on and appropriates "the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, out of any money in the Treasury," for the payment of the salary to the end of the current fiscal year. The amount that would be due upon the salary of this officer, if he is to be a new officer, would be only $1,000, one half of the amount included in this bill. If he is to be an old officer, if we are paying the First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury $4,000, and this is intended as a deficiency to pay the salary of the present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, then I am opposed to the whole appropriation. But if it is merely designed to pay for the salary of a Second Assistant who is hereafter to be appointed, it ought to be $1,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With regard to the last suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa, I presume the explanation is that the salary was originally fixed at $4,000 by the other House, and as this bill was brought in on the 27th of January, and the gentleman was there acting as Assistant Secretary, I suppose they put the appropriation at one half a whole year's salary in order to date from the 1st of January, and added, "or so much thereof as may be found necessary." Those words are in. Of course they can pay him no more than he is entitled to under the law. It is that "loose" practice of appropriation spoken of by Senators before; and that is, where we are not certain as to the exact sum, we put in enough and take it for granted there will not be anything more allowed by the accounting officers than is absolutely earned, for the payment of the officer. It will be so when this goes into operation.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator speaks of the Assistant Secretary being there in office now. Do

I understand the Senator to mean that this Assistant Secretary—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was about to explain it. I said the gentleman who has been filling that place is designed to fill this. I so understand.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the old one remains.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If you do not be quite in so much of a hurry I will explain the matter as I understand it. Mr. Harrington was for a long time quite unwell, and sometime last fall—I do not know the exact time—he became so very sick that he was entirely broken down and obliged to leave the Department for a time, intending to be absent for a short period, I do not know how long. He concluded to go to Europe, having found by experience that it was no use for him to remain on this continent anywhere where he could be reached, for there would be continual calls on him; and if he was going to derive any benefit, he must put the water between him and this place. I am informed that he was dealt with in reference to that precisely as every clerk in a Department is dealt with in similar circumstances. If he gets sick and broken down in the service of the Government, he is allowed a leave of absence for a time, and ordinarily his place is supplied by somebody else, and they make it up as they can.

Mr. Harrington having gone, the Secretary of the Treasury invited Mr. Field, who I believe is a very accomplished officer, to come into the place while he was absent, and he came there with the understanding that he was to be paid precisely the same as the Assistant Secretary was paid. He has been discharging the duty. I understand, however, in point of fact, that Mr. Harrington has drawn his salary and Mr. Field has also drawn his. That I understand to be so; I am so informed; Mr. Harrington being allowed leave of absence and being dealt with precisely as all clerks are in the Departments under similar circumstances.

But the Secretary has become convinced, I am satisfied, that it would be very beneficial to the Department, in fact it is almost necessary, that there should be another Assistant Secretary. In authorizing it, however, we reduce the salary from $4,000 to $3,000, and agree to the House proposition with that amendment. Now it is to be considered whether or not the Senate will sanction what the Finance Committee have recommended in relation to that matter, and will make an appropriation to pay the Assistant Secretary his salary without reference to what may be paid the other. Mr. Harrington is on his way back and perhaps will be back in a very short time. We must provide in some way or other for the payment of the salary of the Second Assistant Secretary that we make. I presume there is no objection to that. If we strike this clause out we appoint an officer without any appropriation made to pay him.

There is no sort of concealment or mystery about it. The question simply is as to the practice. For myself I do not see any particular wrong; on the contrary I feel that it is due to a public officer who has by very great labor, if such is the fact, broken down his health in the service of the Government and there is a prospect of his recovery by taking a vacation, to allow him a little rest and let him draw his salary, unless it is understood that he is to be absent for so long a period as to make it very material. We do not pay pensions, and therefore the pension principle cannot be applied.

I do not know that I am correct exactly in the statement I have made. I only state my understanding of it from what I have picked up and what I infer. I suppose myself substantially to be correct in what I have stated.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask whether there was any law authorizing the appointment of an assistant, or is it proposed as a law now for the first time?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; there was no law for it; but this gentleman simply took the place of Mr. Harrington.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have salaries been paid to both?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose so. I do not know the fact; but I suppose so from this appropriation being made large enough to cover the length of time that is stated. How the fact is I do not know. I am merely stating my supposition. I am not so correctly informed as to the facts that I would have the Senate place any particular reliance on my statement; but I suppose the case to be as I have stated it. I think that ordinarily in the case of short absences of a clerk or any officer of that sort, his duties may be performed by some other clerk; and the thing is made up so that both of them can get along.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say that I think the practice has been where any officer of the Government is unwell, or from any cause is unable for a short time to discharge the duties of his office—and that includes the higher as well as the inferior officers—his place is supplied by some one in the same Department; and all that the United States pay in a case of that description is the difference between the salary which that officer is getting and what he would get if he really held the office whose duties he temporarily discharges. What has been done in this case may be right for aught I know; but it seems to be new to me. I understand the case to be, on the supposition of fact which the Senator has stated, that Mr. Harrington being broken down by the business of the particular office, was obliged to leave the country for his health; and while he was gone, because he was gone, the Secretary appointed this gentleman who was not in the Department—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was not possible in reference to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, an office so important, as the Senator will see, to merely transfer a clerk to fill the place.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose, however, the appointment is not more important than heads of Departments and other places that are always filled by somebody in the Department, or almost always, with very rare exceptions. The difference is only the difference between the pay the particular officer who is made the locum tenens for the time is getting and the pay due to the duties which he is temporarily performing. In the beginning, I think, and I believe it was so held by the present Chief Justice of the United States when he was Attorney General, it was supposed that an officer who was appointed to fill another office was entitled to the salary of both offices; but that was corrected (either by legislation or by the subsequent opinion of some other Attorney General, or perhaps under a subsequent opinion of the Chief Justice himself as Attorney General) so as to authorize an officer who was taken out of any particular office and placed in the discharge of the duties of another office, whether he went on to discharge the duties of both or not, to be paid only one salary, and that salary he had a right to select for himself, and of course he always selected the one which was the largest. But this is the first case I have ever known where a person has been taken entirely outside of the Department and put into an office of this description, both salaries being paid.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will see that it is not so, as far as this time is calculated here. This bill was brought in on January 27, 1864. The Senator will observe this office is created by the other House at a salary of $4,000, and $2,000, "or so much thereof as may be found necessary," is appropriated only to pay his salary for the year, and calculating from the 1st of January it would cover the whole $2,000, so that there is no appropriation here for any such thing as is supposed. What the arrangement was between Mr. Harrington and Mr. Field I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON. When was Mr. Field appointed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know when he was appointed, but it was some time in the course of the fall. There is no appropriation for him here except from the 1st day of January.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Finance the propriety of striking out this whole section, and letting this proposition for a new Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stand on its own basis by itself, as all other propositions of like character. In the first place, the Senator is not able to inform us, as he usually is in regard to propositions of this sort, as to what the exact facts are; whether two men have been paid for performing the duties of this office. In the second place, I think this comes within the rule that the chairman laid down last Friday, that it is not a deficiency based upon a law that has been passed by Congress, but a new proposition entirely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Many of these things get into deficiency bills, however.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the chairman resisted one on that ground the other day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken about that, but there is no difficulty about this. That question does not arise here. I have made these statements simply in reply to the Senator; but it is manifest the question does not arise here except to a very small amount, because the section of the House bill authorizes the appointment of an Assistant Secretary at $4,000, and they appropriate only $2,000, or so much as may be found necessary to pay the salary up to the 1st of July. That would only go back to the 1st of January, you will see, if you pay the whole $2,000. It is evident, therefore, that all they meant to appropriate was just what he would be entitled to receive from January 1.

Then the question that the Senator puts to me is outside of this entirely, and that is how this matter has been done heretofore. That I do not know anything about. I understand incidentally that Mr. Harrington has drawn his salary. The presumption is that he has settled that matter with Mr. Field himself. How it is, I do not know; but so far as this provision is concerned it does not embrace the question any way whatever. If an officer has been employed there to take Mr. Harrington's place, it is perfectly manifest that he must be paid somehow or other, and he knows on what presumption he went in there. That remains to be settled between him and Mr. Harrington, if you please, or between him and the Secretary, but so far as this provision is concerned, there is no impropriety in it, for under this he can only receive the amount of money that he is entitled to receive according to his salary, from the time of his appointment up to the 1st day of July.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know exactly where we stand. I should like to know in the first place whether it is not a rule that no appropriation shall be paid out on this bill in consequence of an attempt to perform or to carry out some law of Congress, or to carry into execution some previous and original appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there are a great many other things put upon these bills. In the first place there is no rule of the Senate in relation to the matter. There is a rule of the Senate that any committee of the Senate may move a money appropriation upon any bill they please, unless it is to pay a private claim, and some limitations of that sort. The consequence is that a great many items get on these bills which are not strictly germane to them. It has always been the practice that anything pressing and absolutely necessary to be done in the judgment of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House may be put on these bills, and something of the kind must necessarily come on these bills incidentally. If the Senator will look at the last section of the bill providing for new clerks he will find that that is new legislation. The only difference is that it presented itself in the first place in the shape of an appropriation; the House of Representatives appropriated to pay clerks in such a place so much, in such a place so much, and so on; in fact all along in the first two pages of the bill authorizing the clerks and providing to pay them, there being no previous law for it. The Committee on Finance thought it best to recognize the necessity of the thing and provide that it should be done at once. We simply put it in the shape of a section authorizing the clerks specifically, and then making an appropriation to pay them. Of course in every case where the thing is not pressing and can wait, I make the point upon it and keep it off if I can.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not expect the Senator to answer me accurately, because I have discovered that he is not very well informed in regard to this subject himself; but I should like to know from the Senator whether or not Mr. Field and Mr. Harrington has each been receiving his pay at the rate of $4,000 a year, or whether one has received it at $4,000 and the other at $3,000 provided by this section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With regard to that I can only say to the Senator that I do not know, and I am not bound to know in reference to this provision here, because it has nothing to do with it. It is only an attempt of the Senator to find out something which he thinks I may answer. I cannot tell. I told him that I understood incidentally that Mr. Harrington had drawn his salary. Whether it is so or not I cannot say. It is proposed to pass a law authorizing the appointment of an Assistant Secretary, and to make an appropriation to pay him his salary from the time he is appointed up to the 1st day of July. This is all that is proposed here. It is nothing to that question whether Mr. Harrington has drawn his salary or not, or whether Mr. Field has been paid or not. The Senator can investigate that by a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate how the fact is. It has nothing to do with the question before the Senate, and I am not bound to know how it is. There are a great many things that I ought to know which I do not know; but I utterly deny that I am bound to know particularly a great many things which other Senators ought to know as well as myself. If the Senator is ignorant it is his fault, not mine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am inclined to sustain this bill as it is, on the principle laid down a short time ago, that if too much money is appropriated the officers will pay out only what is proper; so that they will correct it at any rate if we appropriate too much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senate that if they sustain the amendment they provide for the appointment of an officer, but say he is to receive no pay.

The amendment was rejected—ayes six, noes not counted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer now the amendment which I offered on Friday afternoon, to insert after the seventieth line:

That the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter be the same as that of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; and the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the payment of such salary for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

I desire to add but a word or two to what I said on Friday afternoon in favor of this amendment. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior now receives $3,000 a year—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the proposition come from a committee?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; from the Committee on Public Lands. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior now receives $3,000 a year. The amendment proposes that his salary shall be $4,000; or, as it is expressed in the amendment itself, the same as received by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I understand the fact to be that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury receive each $4,000 a year. This amendment proposes to place the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in respect to his salary, on the same ground.

It was suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Finance on Friday that the labors of this officer have decreased, and it is now proposed to increase his compensation. I do not understand that the compensation is regulated by the amount of physical or even of intellectual labor performed by an officer. It is the importance of the position, and the importance of the questions that he is called upon to consider, that control our judgments on questions of salary. If it is right to give the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury $4,000 a year, I am not able to perceive why the Assistant Secretary of the Interior should not receive that sum.

I say there is a reason in favor of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior that does not apply to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The Treasury Department is furnished with a law officer whose business it is to investigate all legal questions that arise in that Department, while the Interior Department is supplied with no such officer. I understand that in the division of labor of that Department all law questions are referred to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and that he is not only an executive officer of the Department, but that he is the law officer for the entire Department; and the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, will allow me to say that the labors of that officer, in my judgment, cannot be materially diminished by the change of the condition of the country. He has to supervise the operations of several very important bureaus. I know that the labors in the Land Office have diminished, and that therefore there cannot be so many questions going from that office to the Interior Department on appeal as in past years; but yet there are very important questions going up every day. California questions growing out of the surveys of private land claims in California are not yet fully disposed of. There are very important questions connected with the surveys of private land claims in Missouri yet to be adjudicated in that Department. The grant of lands to States to aid agricultural colleges adds very much to the labors of these particular officers, and also the railroad grants and the swamp land grants. I need not refer to the other grants of public lands which raise in the execution of the laws very important and delicate questions. These all go, in case of appeal, to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Then, sir, from the Indian office very important questions go to him for consideration. I do not know, for I have not investigated it, to what extent the Interior Department has appellate jurisdiction or supervisory jurisdiction over the operations of the Patent Office; but I believe there is a supervising jurisdiction.

This is an important office, and its incumbent has an inferior salary to that given to similar officers in other Departments. He is an able, he is a learned man. He is qualified to discharge the executive duties of the Department as well as to settle the legal questions that come before him; and I say that his compensation of $3,000, in view of the fact that a higher compensation is given to Assistant Secretaries in other Departments, is a distinction that we ought not longer to tolerate. In the Post Office Department I can conceive of but very few law questions arising, but in the Interior Department, one of the most important Departments of the Government, regulating the domestic questions that arise in the different important bureaus under it, it seems to me the reason is very strong in favor of giving a compensation to the Assistant Secretary equal to that given in any other Department.

Does the Senator who is at the head of the Finance Committee say that the Secretary of the Interior, because there is not quite so much labor there as in the Treasury Department, ought not to have the same compensation as the Secretary of the Treasury? Would he be willing to make a distinction of that sort? I am sure he would not. The salary is the same. Then, by the same reason that controls that question, the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior ought to have the same compensation as the First Assistant Secretary of the Navy or of the Treasury. I think it is an act of justice. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior gets now the same compensation that the Commissioner of the General Land Office receives, and the same that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs receives, and a less compensation than the Commissioner of Patents receives. If, indeed, he is an officer having jurisdiction over these bureaus, ought not his compensation to correspond with his grade and his responsibility? Shall he control the operations of the Land Office upon appeals, and have just the same compensation as the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment. The Senator from Indiana has given a very good reason why the Commissioner of the General Land Office should receive $4,000 a year, and I move that "the Commissioner of the General Land Office" be added to "the Assistant Secretary of the Interior" in his amendment. His argument is wholly in favor of the Commissioner, who has all these important cases to decide, whose labors are enormous and continuous, and whom I consider to be a man of very great ability. If there is any Assistant Secretary or any head of a bureau who is to receive $4,000, I desire to add the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to repeat what I said the other day in reference to this matter. The Senate already begins to see what will be the consequence of increasing those salaries; but I wish to notice one thing—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to interrupt him? He asked me whether the amendment which I proposed was from a committee. I suppose that was with a view to a rule on that subject?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will inquire from him why he does not ask the same question of the Senator who proposed an amendment just now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is an amendment to an amendment. The Senator from Michigan proposes to amend the amendment offered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it not within the rule? It is within the spirit of it very clearly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply want to say to my honorable friend from Indiana that I listened with some, I was about to say, amusement to his argument that the Assistant Secretary of the Interior had these law questions to settle, because when I was first applied to as I was by the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Smith, now dead, to let him have an Assistant Secretary, he put it upon the ground that his time was so employed in the investigation and decision of law questions that he must have somebody to do the business of the office, that all his time was taken up in settling law questions and appeals. Now, it seems Mr. Otto, the Assistant Secretary, is occupied in settling law questions in that office, his time is so taken up, and they are of so much importance that he must be paid extra. I should like to know what there is left for the Secretary of the Interior to do. He got rid of the ordinary business of the office before by the appointment of an Assistant Secretary, because he had the law questions to investigate and settle himself, and now it seems the law questions are investigated by the assistant. It seems, then, that the Secretary of the Interior holds only an honorary position and has nothing to attend to there, because he has now divested himself of the law that took up all his time before he had an assistant.

Mr. President, I refused to have any agency in the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I did not see any reason for it. But my friend from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] came in from the Committee on Public Lands and moved that an Assistant Secretary of the Interior be allowed, and gave, I suppose, the same reasons that had been given to me by the then Secretary of the Interior; and he succeeded in persuading the Senate that it was necessary to appoint this officer, and Mr. Usher took the place knowing what the salary was, and performed the duties; and when he was made Secretary of the Interior he appointed Mr. Otto, and he knew what the salary was when he took it. Now I really hope that the Senate will not go any further than it has gone. Sir, we made a great mistake when we increased the salary of any of them in these times. It was an oversight, and if the thing was to be done over again I should object to the whole of it, and would not do it for the Assistant Secretary of the Navy or the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The first, in fact, passed without my knowing it or observing it. It was not in an appropriation bill; it was in a different law. I afterwards consented to the raising of the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and I am sorry I did that; but I hope the Senate will go no further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the apprehension of the Chair the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is not in order. It proposes to increase an appropriation, and is not in order unless it comes from some standing committee. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

Mr. HALE. There seems to be a pretty general regret expressed, and especially by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the Senate ever departed from the standard of $3,000 for the salary of any of the Assistant Secretaries. The expression of sorrow implies repentance, but repentance is worth nothing unless it is followed by works, and I think the better way would be to equalize them now. If it was wrong to put any of them higher when it was done, it is wrong now. I have no particular preferences or prejudices in favor of the Treasury Department or the Navy Department, but I think the Assistant Secretaries in those Departments ought to be content to stand with the other Assistant Secretaries.

Mr. President, some men have seemed to think from the commencement of this rebellion that the great remedy was to increase salaries; that if you had a man who was rather inefficient in a position, instead of turning him out and putting in a more efficient man, you should raise his salary and increase his rank. I think we have tried that long enough. I do not think the rebellion has been at all checked by the increased salaries we have paid, and it seems to be admitted that the step we took in putting one or two of these Assistant Secretaries higher than the rest has led to dissatisfaction and heart-burning and jealousy, and constant movements to have this one put up as high as that one, and so on. I think we had better take the back track. I move, therefore, to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana by providing that hereafter the salaries of each and all the Assistant Secretaries shall be $3,000 per annum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The effect of that will be to leave two at $4,000 and the others at $3,000, unless you repeal the laws allowing $4,000.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; I will modify the amendment by saying that after the close of the current fiscal year the salaries of each and all the Assistant Secretaries shall be $3,000 per annum.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senator from Indiana, when he was upon the floor a few minutes ago, asked why the Assistant Secretary of the Interior should not receive the same salary as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I can tell the Senator why. The Interior Department has but very little business to do on the Atlantic coast. The business of that Department is confined mainly to the western country—to lands, Indians, pensions—and that is the reason why the Assistant Secretary of the Interior cannot be paid as much as Mr. Fox and Mr. George Harrington, not because he has not as much work to do, not because his business is not of as much importance to the country, but because the duties of that Department do not lie on the sea-coast.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will prevail. It is unjust, unfair, and a discrimination that ought not to be tolerated by this Government, to pay Mr. Fox $4,000, when he holds the same rank precisely that Mr. Otto does, who receives but $3,000. If you read what Mr. Dickerson says about the efficiency of Mr. Fox, and if people believe what is said about the efficiency of that officer, he ought not to be paid $1,500. It is alleged by very scientific men that all his actions tend to embarrass the operations of the Government very much, rather than to aid and prosper them. I do not think so, because I do not know anything about it; but certain it is that so far as the material interests of this country are concerned, the Interior Department is one of the most important Departments of the Government. It relates to those matters and to those interests which uphold the Government in the conduct of this war. It relates to the interests of the great laboring element of the interior of this country, the men who are carrying the burdens of this war on their shoulders, and I am sorry that any discrimination of this kind should be made against it. I do not care particularly about raising the salary of Judge Otto, but I do think it is unjust and unfair, and a discrimination that should not be permitted, that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy or of the Treasury should receive $4,000, while the Assistant Secretary of the Interior receives but $3,000.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, obtained the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment. Mr. President, with reference to the remark which has been made by the honorable Senator from Minnesota I have simply to say that so far as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy is concerned, the bill originating that office and fixing his salary at $4,000 was brought into the Senate and advocated and carried through by a western man.

Mr. WILKINSON. He has got "Navy on the brain."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be the fact. If they have got anything on their brain out there that is troublesome I wish they would get rid of it. [Laughter.] But the fact is as I have stated. Now in reference to raising the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, that proposition came from the House of Representatives and was concurred in here. It was not originated here. I have said what my opinion was in reference to that matter, and of course I do not wish to repeat it; but I want to say to the Senator that in my judgment the great West, the almighty

West, the all-pervading West, the without-which-nothing-else-lives-in-the-world, the West, has some interest in the Treasury of the United States, I reckon, as well as the Atlantic coast.

Mr. WILKINSON. We do not get much out of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What salary do we give to the honorable gentleman who came from Indiana and has $5,000 a year, the Comptroller of the Currency—more than the Assistant Secretary very considerably. I believe he was a distinguished citizen of the West.

Mr. WILKINSON. I submit that it was necessary to find the brains competent to manage that department of the Government, and it was necessary to go to the West to find them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will put it upon that ground. I have already admitted that the West furnished everything; that there was nothing without it, brains or anything else, in its own estimation. I think this is all idle talk. I am sorry to hear such a remark from the honorable Senator from Minnesota. I believe he is the only Senator in the whole number who ever in this Senate makes an allusion of that kind, which is sectional and calculated to create ill feeling. There are one or two members of the House of Representatives who do the same thing. I have only to say with regard to it that in my experience in this world (because this is an imputation of motive, and of bad motive), those gentlemen who are so anxious to impute bad motives and sectional motives to others in matters of legislation must draw from consciousness, and from nothing else.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, perhaps I have a little greater reason for making a remark of this kind than most Senators here. The other day I had a little proposition that I offered to pay the Minnesota soldiers and one or two other regiments of soldiers who happened to be mustered in before the time for being mustered in, and who by a technical decision had been excluded from the bounty which was extended by a subsequent act of Congress to soldiers who served two years in the Army. They had been through twenty-five fights; they had served in all the great pitched battles that have taken place in the army of the Potomac. Fifteen hundred of them had been sent from Minnesota to the Potomac, and they came back here the other day, three hundred of them, on their way home. A technical decision had been made in the War Department, which the Paymaster General construed as depriving these men of the right to the benefit of the law which was passed giving a bounty of $100 to men who served for two years in the Army.

The Senator from Maine, the guardian of the Treasury, rose in his seat and opposed that proposition. He moved to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I felt some sympathy for our soldiers. I felt I suppose about the same sympathy for our men who had fought and been maimed and wounded that the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance feels for a Maine soldier. I felt that it was bad treatment; Mr. President, I felt that it was unkind treatment; and being a radical, being rather impulsive in my nature, seeing opposition so unjust, coming from a quarter so high, from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, I could hardly restrain my impulsive western nature from throwing out some remarks that the Senator has now rebuked me for to-day.

Well, sir, I suppose it was wrong; I think I was very wrong in saying it; and I would not give a snap for a man who does not do something wrong sometimes. I do not know that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance ever is betrayed into an indiscretion on this floor. I have heard Senators around me say so sometimes, but perhaps it would be ungenerous for me to say so, being a western man. I do not know that a western man has any right to have any opinions which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance is bound to respect.

Some of the people from the eastern country are very sensitive about anything that is said in favor of the West; they are remarkably sensitive whenever anything is ever uttered here in favor of the West. Sir, they ought to be a little more generous. They ought to know that the West is young, that New England is old. They ought to know that the West is made up from New England and from the eastern country generally; and the old men of New England and the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee ought to have a little more charity for the young, vigorous, impulsive, and imprudent people of the West, for they are very imprudent. I will say to the honorable Senator from Maine, however, that they will fight for their country; and they fight, not as you do on the Potomac, going forward one day and back the next, but they fight to win. They have gone into this war with a determination to put down the rebellion; and the western people have won more territory than is contained within the dominions of Austria and France combined.

Now, I ask the honorable Senator if we have not a right to be a little impudent? I ask him if we have not a right to assert here our position upon this floor and boast a little in regard to the influence and the rights, if need be, of the people of the West? What have we done, sir? What have these people of the West done since this war commenced? They have won and redeemed for this country the whole State of Missouri; they have redeemed the whole State of Arkansas; they have redeemed the whole of Tennessee and all of Mississippi. What has the eastern army redeemed? What has this great army recovered for the country and for the Union? It has marched down to the Rapidan and it has marched back again, and it has been swinging like the pendulum of a clock, one day going forward twenty miles, and the next day going back thirty miles. [Laughter.]

This, sir, is my excuse for saying things that I ought not to say; and let me tell the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, in conclusion, that I will take it all back. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's taking it back will not do. I have something to say on that subject. In the first place, when he says that I opposed his bill, he states what is not the fact. I did not oppose it. When he endeavors to put the imputation on me of being opposed to paying the soldiers what is due to them, it is an imputation he has no right to make, for it is not true.

What are the facts? The Senator came into this body with a bill for paying soldiers—a subject of which we knew nothing, and of which we could tell nothing. He asked us to take that bill on his statement, and without referring it to a committee, to pass it, to pay money out of the Treasury—a thing that never has been done in such a case—and a bill indefinite in its amount; for nobody could tell how far it would extend from the terms in which it was drawn.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Senator will allow me to say that he did not object to the facts, but he said it involved a legal question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator should hear me. Of course I did not object to the facts. Was I to say that what the Senator had stated was not true? I did not know whether it was so or not. It might be or might not be. No doubt the Senator believed it to be so.

Mr. WILKINSON. Why, then, did he not move to refer it to the Military Committee, where it belonged?

Mr. FESSENDEN. What difference does it make what committee it went to? The Senator in the course of his remarks stated that there was some legal question about it; that a legal question had been made. He asked that it be passed here on the ground that there was a technical legal question, and that we should take his bill on his say-so, on his statement of facts, taking money out of the Treasury to an indefinite amount, and pass it through the Senate without any investigation at all. That was the claim he made. I objected, as it was my duty to object. Sir, the place which I hold in the Senate compels me to run counter, perhaps, to the wishes of gentlemen. I cannot help it. I must do my duty in reference to these matters. If I see a step about to be taken which is contrary to our ordinary practice and fraught with danger, it is my duty to resist it, whether it is in favor of soldiers or sailors or anybody else. No such thing was ever heard of as a bill being brought in here to pay regiments, and on the statement of a single Senator, without investigation of the facts to know whether he was mistaken or otherwise, to pass it directly through the body, and make it the law so far as the Senate are concerned. That was what I objected to. I do not know who it was about me that suggested in a quiet way that there was a legal question involved, and I moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I did it at the time as a sort of joke. I supposed the Senator would object of course and say it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. My object was to send it to a committee; but, as I said before, I have great confidence in the Committee on the Judiciary, and if there was a legal question I was willing that they should investigate it. I did not care where it went so that it went to a committee to be investigated. I have no choice in reference to that matter. There was nothing in that. Does the Senator deem it unsafe in the hands of the Judiciary Committee? Will it not be investigated there? Are they not competent to investigate it? Does the Senator mean to insinuate that the bill is killed by being sent to his friends to investigate it?

Mr. WILKINSON. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WILKINSON. That first Minnesota regiment was known to everybody on this floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir, I knew nothing about it, except that there was such a Minnesota regiment. I knew there was such a regiment, but I knew nothing as to the question whether it had been paid or not.

Mr. WILKINSON. The bill did not propose any such thing if they had been paid. It merely gave them the same rights as other regiments, and the honorable Senator knows very well that that regiment had been in all these battles if he read the newspapers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where had that Minnesota regiment been serving?

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Senator does not know that that regiment has been in this army of the Potomac—

Mr. FESSENDEN. What, and swinging backward and forward, twenty miles one way one day and thirty miles another the next day?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A western regiment! Is it possible? [Laughter.] And yet the Senator says we must pass their bills without inquiry, whether they deserve the money or not. The Senator has forgotten himself. I cannot believe that it was for the first Minnesota regiment such a feeling appeal was made, and in regard to which we must not even investigate the facts. It had been in this very army of the Potomac, swinging back and forth and doing nothing; and that is the Senator's statement about his own regiment! He tells us that this army of the Potomac has done nothing; that western men fight and win battles; that eastern men, and men in the army of the Potomac, march twenty miles one day in one direction and march back thirty miles the next, and that is all they do. Why, is it possible? I can hardly believe that the Senator would claim anything for soldiers who had been engaged in that way. What a commentary on the soldiers of Minnesota, from their own Senator!

Now, sir, I do not like to be accused in this way before the Senate for simply doing what I conceive to be my duty in all cases. No man is more ready than I am and always have been to render ample justice, ample praise, and all the glory that any man can claim for them, to the gallant soldiers of the West. No man has ever heard a word out of my mouth but of praise for the gallant soldiers of the West on all occasions; and I defy the Senator now here to-day or any other day (and he may search the records) to find when I have given a sectional vote; one that could be fairly construed as such on any question before the Senate; one that looked even that way, or that he could trace to any sectional feeling, in any shape or form. I think I may utter the same defiance for all the gentlemen who represent New England. Of all men, certainly they have a right to claim that they legislate upon a liberal policy. There never has been a day, or an hour, or a moment when we have not been ready to vote anything and everything that justice claimed, or that even liberality claimed, that we could vote for the West as well as for the other sections of the country, without reference to any sectional feeling; and any imputation to the contrary is unjust and unkind.

More especially is it unkind in the Senator, and more especially is it unkind and unjust to throw such imputations upon the gallant soldiers of the army of the Potomac, who, whenever they have had a chance to fight, have fought as well as any soldiers ever fought under the sun, shed their blood as freely and as readily, and have been and are as ready to lay down their lives as generously, ay, as even the proudest and the bravest men that represent the West; and thank God, many of them, a great number of them, came from our own New England, and I feel proud of them as such, as well as that I am a citizen with them of the same great Republic. The Senator when he comes to reflect upon the gross unkindness, the gross injustice he has been guilty of by sneering at the gallant men who have fought anywhere and everywhere that their leaders would let them fight, will, I dare say, regret it, especially when he finds that he has mixed up many gallant western soldiers, from Michigan, from Minnesota, and from other States, in the same category with them, and thrown an imputation on their courage and their manhood.

Sir, I have nothing to say of any of them except words of praise. I say before God there was never a braver people on the face of the earth than all the people of this country as a general rule—there are individual cowards, of course—not only eastern men and western men, but southern men. I glory in the courage even of our enemies as Americans, and I give them all praise for it. There are no braver men on the face of the earth than they are. It so happens that in some quarters our armies have not been well led. Let the Senator reflect—

Mr. WILKINSON. I cannot permit the Senator to misconstrue my language in this way. I uttered no word against the private soldiers. I spoke of the armies, and of course I had—

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the Army made up of, I will ask the Senator? Is the Army made up of officers alone?

Mr. WILKINSON. The management of that Army in directing it to go one day forward and another day backward depends entirely on the commanders of the Army, and the Senator well knows it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. When the Senator speaks of the officers, I cannot tell how far they have acted wisely or otherwise. But let him reflect (and by this be it understood I throw no imputation on anybody, and do not mean to be understood so) that the Commander-in-Chief of the whole Army, who directs the whole, is a western man. Who is your President? He is responsible. He made the officers, and he keeps the officers in command. He directs the course of the Army. Where did he come from? If you mean to impute all this to him, say it to him and say whom you mean. He makes the officers, he keeps them in command, and he instructs them and directs them. Speak of him and do not talk about individual subordinates, what they do and what they do not do. Here is my friend who is at the head of the committee on the conduct of the war, [Mr. WADE,] directing the whole of it. He is a western man, and I wish he was a general officer and in command of an army.

I have said thus much to defend myself from the charge of being sectional and not being willing to do justice here and there and everywhere. I apologize to the Senate. As chairman of the Committee on Finance, I have no business, no right, perhaps, to allow these debates to call me out in this way, and thus spend the time of the Senate, but I cannot stand personal imputations, and more than all, I cannot stand imputations on my section, especially on their courage and their manliness, without replying.

Mr. WILKINSON. I would not say a word but to answer some things that have been said by the Senator from Maine. He has the reputation of being perhaps the best lawyer in New England. He is very well skilled, undoubtedly, in special pleading and in making "the worse appear the better reason." The Senator has endeavored to fasten upon me sentiments which I did not utter, and which he knows very well I did not intend to utter. He ridicules the idea that this Minnesota regiment is entitled to any credit because I said that this army had not succeeded. They have a very little credit; they have left a thousand of their men in Virginia. It is true they have fought to very little purpose—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said that the Senator denied them credit. I did not.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is an illustration of what I have just stated, that owing to his character for astuteness, which I presume he acquired as a lawyer in his practice at the bar, the Senator has attempted to fasten upon me the utterance of sentiments which I never intended to utter, and he knows it. I submit that that is a little unbecoming the high character of the honorable Senator from Maine. Sir, this is not a place for pettifoggery. I supposed that he quit that business twenty years ago, perhaps thirty. He ought never to have entered into it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am very unwilling to call the Senator to order, but I submit to the Chair whether personal remarks of that kind are in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) In the opinion of the Chair the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota are not in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What was it the Senator said?

Mr. WILKINSON. That the Senator from Maine ought to have quit pettifoggery twenty years ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What did the Senator say before that?

Mr. WILKINSON. That was all. That was the remark the Senator from Maryland took exception to.

Mr. JOHNSON. You said that he knew that what he said was not true.

Mr. WILKINSON. I said that the Senator from Maine knew very well that I did not intend to disparage the private soldiers in the army of the Potomac.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I could not put any other construction upon what the Senator said. I will say to the Senator that I have no doubt that if he coolly deliberates on the effect of his own words he will be ready to retract them; and yet his language was distinct; he said "the army of the Potomac."

Mr. WILKINSON. I spoke of the Army in the aggregate. I do not believe there was a braver class of men ever assembled together in an army than the private soldiers who constitute the grand army of the Potomac. It is my humble judgment that the battle of Gettysburg was the greatest and most heroic victory that ever was won anywhere on any battle-field, and it was done by the stubbornness and by the bravery of the soldiers. But, Mr. President, the Senator knows very well and the country knows that this army of the Potomac as an army has not been as successful as the army of the West has been.

Now, in regard to the proposition which I introduced here, and with reference to which I then thought and still think the Senator from Maine acted a very unfair and illiberal part. I offered a proposition that was so fair that nobody need mistake in regard to it, and I asked the Senate as a favor that it might be passed without being referred to a committee. I do not suppose there is another Senator here on this floor who would have raised the least objection to passing it upon the facts being stated. This is not the only case in which that Senator has opposed measures which were fair and just and liberal on their face, and has delayed and hindered the action of this body on propositions similar to that which did not come directly from his own committee, and I may be permitted to say that the honorable Senator has acted sometimes a little like a dictator on this floor, and that, too, to parties who did not occupy much of the time of the Senate. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for what I have already said in regard to this matter.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. When I yielded the floor to the distinguished Senator from Maine about an hour since I did not apprehend so interesting a debate as resulted from my politeness on that occasion. I am not inclined to interfere in this war at all. I accord perfectly the rights of belligerents to both the gentlemen, one the very able and distinguished representative from the East and one from the West. But if the Senate will pardon me for occupying a moment of its time on the appropriate business before the body, I will endeavor to state precisely what this question is.

This is a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current fiscal year. To that bill my colleague introduces an amendment to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior from $3,000 to $4,000 per annum. He is instructed to move that amendment by a committee of this body, the Committee on Public Lands. Your present legislation stands thus: the Assistant Secretaries of War receive $3,000 a year; the Assistant Secretary of the Interior receives $3,000; the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury receives $4,000, and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy $4,000. It is not for me to state the importance of the Interior Department, the efficiency and skill and ability and great learning which the Assistant Secretary of the Interior brings to the discharge of his duty. I have only to say that your legislation should be equal; for without any disparagement of any of the other Assistant Secretaries in any of the Departments, no gentleman well informed and with a proper regard for candor will say that any of them are in any capacity superior to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Then I ask that your legislation shall be equal; either that the Assistant Secretary of the Interior shall have his salary increased, or that the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury shall be reduced to $3,000 a year, and I am rather indifferent as to which course the Senate shall take; but a proper regard to justice and the public interests, it does seem to me, requires that the salaries of these Assistant Secretaries should be made equal. I of course do not enter into this discussion as to the relative merits of soldiers East or West. I am equally proud of their prowess and bravery and patriotism from whatsoever quarter of the Republic they come.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana who introduced this amendment [Mr. HENDRICKS] that I am in favor of his proposition, but I do not believe that upon an appropriation bill it is wise to introduce the question of the raising of salaries, because it opens a very wide field of debate. The truth is, if I were to express my opinion on the question of salaries, I am decidedly of opinion that the salaries of these Assistant Secretaries should be put upon a footing of equality, and that they should be raised up to the salary of $4,000 a year in all the Departments. I will say further—and I do not hesitate to express my opinion—that the heads of bureaus ought to have their salaries raised to at least the sum of $3,500; for no man in this Government labor so much as these heads of bureaus do day and night upon a salary that cannot support themselves and their families here in Washington. But I do not believe it is wise on a deficiency bill to get up a discussion of that subject, for we enter on a field which is very broad, and which ought to be settled in some special bill on that subject. I hope that a bill on that subject will be brought in, and then we may discuss the matter by itself. It is very important, as I understand, that this deficiency bill should receive the sanction of Congress at an early day.

Mr. President, I have listened, I venture to say, with as much interest as any one to what has occurred here in the Senate between the two Senators, both of whom I claim to be my friends upon this floor, the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Maine. I regret myself that any comparison should be made between the armies of the East and the West. We are all one people. The West are the children of the East, the sons of the East, and I believe that the armies in all sections of the country have shown themselves to be equally brave and equally distinguished upon the battle-field. They have not always been as successful in the results of battles, it is true, in the army of the Potomac as in the army of the West; but the soldiers of Maine, the soldiers of Minnesota, the soldiers of Wisconsin, together have been brigaded both East and West, and braver men never met or fought or bled on any field in the history of the world. Sir, in this very army of the Potomac the men of the second and the third and the sixth and the seventh Wisconsin, and the men from Michigan, and the men from Minnesota, side by side with the men from Vermont and the men from Maine and Massachusetts, have stood together in the day of the most terrible conflicts. Freely would they bare their bosoms in each other's defense. Together their life-blood has often gushed and mingled, and side by side their bones now lie upon that soil where they have laid down their lives for Union and for liberty. Sir, no comparison, in my judgment, ought to be drawn between these brave men.

But, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I do not believe this bill is the proper bill on which to raise this question of increasing salaries. I am in favor of raising the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I am also in favor of raising the Assistant Postmasters' General, that those gentlemen who have the same rank may have the same pay. I would be willing, as I said, to go for a measure which should raise the salaries of heads of bureaus, for their salaries were fixed as long ago as 1798, I believe, and were fixed at $3,000, when the heads of Departments were fixed at $6,000. The heads of Departments have been raised up to $8,000, and the heads of bureaus have remained the same as before. Now, where is there a man in this Government who labors any more than the Second Auditor of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Pensions or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and these various officers, men who are distinguished in capacity, and who must be men of great ability to discharge faithfully the duties of these offices? But, Mr. President, I do not think this is the bill on which to discuss this question, or enter into the general subject of raising salaries. You cannot raise the salary of one or cut down the salary of one without opening the whole field of discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that this question about the salary of Assistant Secretaries might as well be settled now as at some future time. The Committee on Finance have been bothered about this matter probably more than about any other question now pending in Congress. The Assistant Secretary of the Interior very justly complains that a discrimination is made between himself and two other Assistant Secretaries. That discrimination is manifestly unjust. What has been said about Judge Otto is true: he is an able man, and in his profession could undoubtedly earn much more money than he gets here. He has said to me that he does not care so much about the salary as he does about the discrimination in favor of others of the same rank.

I think, therefore, the best solution of this difficulty, as but two of these Assistant Secretaries are receiving the enlarged pay of $4,000, is to adopt the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE], and put them all on the same footing, and hereafter discuss the question of raising them. I know very well that it is a sentiment of honor which objects to the discrimination; and if I was one of these Assistant Secretaries, feeling that I was competent to discharge the duties of my office, I should dislike very much that men of the same rank should receive higher pay. I would regard that as a matter of much more moment than a thousand dollars. I should not like to have that discrimination made against the office I held. That feeling of pride is a feeling we must appreciate. We should feel it ourselves if one of our own body should receive more compensation than ourselves; we should think it very hard. I think, therefore, the better way is to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and put them all on the same footing.

In regard to a general increase of salaries, there is scarcely an officer in the Government but what demands an increased salary, from the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States down to the humblest clerk. I do not see how a clerk can live on $1,200 a year in this city with a family. It is very difficult indeed; and if I was commencing to increase salaries, I would commence with the lowest, not the highest. These gentlemen can live upon their salaries, but many of the clerks and humbler employes can scarcely do so; but in the present condition of affairs I shall not vote to increase the compensation of any civil officer of the Government, because I think in war, when they are enjoying a peaceful, quiet employment, they ought to be willing to receive even reduced compensation while others are sharing the dangers of war in the field.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS, as follows:

Insert after line seventy:

That the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter be the same as that of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; and the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the payment of such salary for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

The amendment of Mr. HALE to the amendment is to strike out all after the word "that," and to insert:

After the close of the present fiscal year the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the several Departments shall be $3,000 per annum.

Mr. POWELL. Is it in order to amend that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. It is now in the second degree; it is an amendment to an amendment which is now pending.

Mr. POWELL. I thought it was not in order, and that is the reason I made the inquiry, for I intended, if in order, to propose an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, providing that these salaries should be paid in coin or its equivalent. If I am rightly informed, these Assistant Secretaries have had as much as $3,000 for a great length of time. Everybody knows that a salary of $3,000 before this paper money got in vogue, was worth as much or more than $4,000 is now; and if you fix the salaries of all these Assistant Secretaries at $3,000, it is very much reduced. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will not prevail, and that the proposition of the Senator from Indiana will be adopted, to bring them up and make them all equal; not by putting them at such a low figure, but paying for talent, industry, and knowledge. They cannot live if you put the salaries down to $2,000 in good money, which it will be if you fix $3,000. No man can stay here and support his family on that salary; and instead of attending to the public business they will turn rogues if they stay here at all, and have to steal for a living. That will be the result of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Sprague, Wilson, and Wright—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like now to hear the whole read with the lines preceding, to see how it looks on the face of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The previous part of the bill will be read, together with the amendment as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows, commencing at line sixty-eight:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Arizona and the clerks in his office, $4,250.

That after the close of the present fiscal year the salaries of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the several Departments shall be $3,000 per annum.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move, if it be in order, to strike out "3,000" and insert "4,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not in order. The Senate have just agreed to the amendment in this precise form. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. A verbal amendment is necessary. The word "and" should be inserted before the word "that."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be added if there be no objection. It can only be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The word "and" will be inserted preceding the word "that."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Ramsey, Riddle, Sausbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Sprague, and Wilson—15.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following amendment, to come in after line one hundred and ninety-nine:

For rebuilding light-house at Cape Charles, Virginia, $20,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that come from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Light-House Board. It is a light-house which was destroyed by the rebels in August last, and it is very important that the appropriation should be made now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to insert at the end of the two hundred and sixth line:

Provided, however, That no money shall be paid under this item of appropriation except for deficiencies actually existing upon contracts made by the Navy Department.

The clause to be amended is as follows:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for ordnance, ordnance stores, labor, and contingent expenses in the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, $2,740,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member permit me to ask him why it is necessary to insert this proviso? What other deficiencies are there?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that there are any. The purpose is to have the intention of Congress carried out in the expenditure of the money, that it shall apply to deficiencies alone, and not apply to anything except deficiencies. I will only say to the Senator that I seek to apply to that Department with which I have had some connection and in which I feel great interest, the same rule that I would seek to apply to every other Department if I had control.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to the rule. I only wanted to know why it was necessary here; whether that would not be the case if the bill passes without the proviso. I ask merely for information.

Mr. GRIMES. It will only be a reminder to the Department that that is the principle on which a deficiency bill is passed, and I would apply it to all the Departments if I was connected with them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to offer an amendment to come in after line two hundred and twenty-eight:

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ an additional laborer from the 1st of February to the end of the current fiscal year, $203.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I offer the following amendment to come in after the appropriation for a deficiency in the contingent fund of the Senate:

Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House of Congress unless the amount is fixed by law or the account is previously examined and approved by the appropriate committee; nor shall any payment ever be made except out of the fund particularly appropriated for the purpose; and no transfer of balances shall be made from one fund to another.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest by common consent that the amendment adopted on the motion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] in regard to the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries be placed in some other part of the bill than where it stands. It now has an exceedingly awkward look. I am not prepared to say where it should go; but certainly it should be placed somewhere where it will not look quite like such awkward legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be placed at the end of the second section with great propriety.

Mr. FOSTER. As it now stands it will have as ungainly a look as anything could have in any bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Are we still in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The second section provides for another Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and I think the clause might be added there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to placing it there?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so placed.

Mr. HALE. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance for a single moment to a provision in this bill; and to make myself understood I will move to strike out the eighty-eighth, eighty-ninth, and ninetieth lines. I do it because I want an explanation from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and if that shall be satisfactory, I shall withdraw the motion. Those lines are in these words:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Naval Academy, $38,000.

I will state my reasons for making the motion, and if the chairman of the Committee on Finance will give a satisfactory reason for the appropriation, of course I will withdraw it. The last Congress made this provision by law:

"That the students at the Naval Academy shall be styled midshipmen until their final graduating examination, when, if successful, they shall be commissioned ensigns, ranking according to merit. The number allowed at the Academy shall be two for every member and delegate of the House of Representatives, two for the District of Columbia, and ten at large. They shall be between the ages of fourteen and seventeen, physically sound, well formed, and of robust constitution."

That fixes the numbers, two for every delegate and member, two for the District of Columbia, and ten at large. In another clause of another section it was provided that there should be ten chosen from the sons of sailors or soldiers or officers. The Secretary of the Navy construed that to be ten in addition to the ten at large. The understanding of the Senate was that they were the ten at large; but that is a trifling difference. Notwithstanding this express provision of the law limiting the number to two for every member and delegate, the Secretary of the Navy went on and appointed two for every congressional district in all the seceded States, or nearly that. He went upon that basis. I do not know that he filled them up to that extent.

The subject was brought to the attention of the Senate and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They investigated it and made a unanimous report to the Senate, and the Senate unanimously affirmed the construction which the committee put upon the law; and that was that the Secretary of the Navy in making these appointments was limited to two for every member and Delegate, and ten at large, and two for the District of Columbia. Notwithstanding that law, he went on and filled up the Academy upon the basis, as I said, that he had a right to appoint not only two for every actual member and for every Delegate, but two for every district in all the seceded States. The Senate, by a unanimous vote, voted that that construction of the law was wrong. Notwithstanding that vote, notwithstanding the very clear provisions of the act of Congress, clear and unmistakable as human language could make it, and the unanimous judgment of the Senate that the law was what it purports to be, the Secretary tells us this year in his report that he has gone on and repeated the same thing over again, and appointed I do not know how many, but upon the basis of two for every district. If in doing that he has created a deficiency, I am unwilling to vote to pay it. I am willing to vote every deficiency that is wanted to carry out the existing law; but when the Secretary comes in and undertakes to construe the law over our heads, a very simple and plain law, and thereby creates a deficiency, I am not willing to make it up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will read the items of the estimate:

"For rent of building for the Naval Academy, for materials, for lighting the Academy and school-ships, for the purchase of stationery, blank-books, copies, and models, for ruling and printing blank forms, &c., and purchase of steam machinery, &c., and for current expenses and repairs of all kinds, $38,000."

That is the estimate.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion then. I will not press it here, but I shall call the attention of the Senate to this subject hereafter.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the almost uniform practice of the Senate, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be read, and all will be regarded as agreed to except those upon which separate votes may be requested. The first amendment will be read. It is a long amendment, striking out the first clause of the bill and adding to the latter part of the bill the same in substance, only changing its phraseology.

Mr. WILSON. We have heard all those amendments read. I do not think it necessary to read them again. I think we may take the vote on them together, unless a separate vote is demanded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that be the sense of the Senate they will be all taken together without reading, except such questions as any Senator may desire a separate vote on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that that long amendment, including quartermaster's supplies, be reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to reserve the one in relation to the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries, simply to take the sense of the Senate whether we will not say $3,500 instead of $3,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be reserved. All the other amendments will be regarded as concurred in. The first amendment upon which a separate vote is asked will be read.

The Secretary read it: to insert after line seventy-eight the following clauses:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the purchase and manufacture of arms for volunteers and regulars, ordnance and ordnance stores, $7,700,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of arms at the national armories, $700,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Surgeon General's department, namely:

For medical instruments and dressings, $1,300,000.

For hospital stores, bedding, &c., $1,200,000.

For hospital furniture and field equipments, $300,000.

For books, stationery, and printing, $36,000.

For ice, fruits, and other comforts, $100,000.

For hospital clothing, $40,000.

For citizen nurses, $38,000.

For sick soldiers in private hospitals, $17,000.

For artificial limbs for soldiers and seamen, $16,000.

For citizen physicians, and medicines furnished by them, $185,000.

For hire of clerks and laborers in purveying depots, $25,000.

For contingent expenses of the medical department, $5,000.

For medicines and medical attendance for negro refugees, commonly called "contrabands," $33,000.

For washing and washing-machines for hospitals where matrons cannot be employed, $1,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army, namely:

For volunteers and drafted men, $5,621,000.

For employes, $640,640.

For women, $218,400.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the engineer department, for contingencies of fortifications, including field-works, $500,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the quartermaster's department, namely:

For purchase of cavalry and artillery horses, $17,500,000.

For regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, $18,500,000.

For barracks, quarters, &c., $3,500,000.

For transportation of the Army, $30,900,000.

For incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, $2,000,000.

For transportation of officers' baggage, $100,000.

For clothing, camp and garrison equipage, $7,000,000.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Adjutant General's department, for the purchase of books of tactics, $25,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. When this subject was up on Friday, it will be remembered that there was a difference of opinion between the Senator from Maine and myself in regard to the mode in which this deficiency was made up. He stated to the Senate very positively that this deficiency was caused by the recent proclamation of the President. Not having read the papers at that time, I could only give my impression that such a deficiency could not arise out of that call, and I so stated. Since that time we have had the estimates on which these additional appropriations are based printed, and they are now on our tables.

It seems from these estimates that much the larger portion of these deficiencies are old deficiencies growing out of the ordinary course of the service, and not in any way connected with the recent proclamation of the President. Fifty-five million dollars out of $78,000,000 are on old items of appropriation. This shows the importance of the rule of which I spoke on that occasion. There was no reason in the world why these estimates should not have been submitted at the beginning of the session, and have gone to the House of Representatives, and have come to us in the regular way. They were withheld until last week, after the bill was considered in the Committee on Finance, after the bill had passed the House of Representatives, and are only introduced now in the form of amendment from the Finance Committee after it had reported the bill. There ought to be some way to correct this mode of estimating. The basis of these amendments the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] was very inquisitive about. He can find the basis of the estimates if he will read this paper. The Quartermaster General finds that there was $254,000,000 appropriated for his department. He finds that the monthly expenditure was so much, and that therefore he will want a certain amount upon the basis of the expenditure. No other items are given. Two hundred and fifty-four million dollars was appropriated for a year; and he finds on hand on the 1st of February, 1864, but $73,000,000, showing a monthly expenditure of something like twenty-five million dollars, and he therefore wants a certain amount in order to carry him to the end of the fiscal year on the same basis of expenditure. These bases of estimate could have been submitted to us on the 1st of December just as well as on the 1st of February. There is no reason for the delay.

I say therefore that there ought to be some mode devised to compel these officers to submit their estimates in the regular way, so that they may come to us through the regular channel, the Secretary of the Treasury. If it were not for the existence of the war, I should oppose this whole appropriation and seek to compel these officers to go through the regular channel of communication. There is nothing on the face of this paper to show that these estimates have ever been submitted to the Secretary of War. I am one of those who believe that the Secretary of War is one of the ablest and one of the best officers of this Government. I believe he has done more to ferret out and punish fraud in the various branches of his Department than any other officer. He is rough, I know, and sometimes rude to those with whom he is brought in business relations; but, so far as I know, he has been uniformly honest and correct, and strict in his surveillance over all the officers of his Department. There is nothing to show that these estimates came even from the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Can my friend say that, when I had the letter of the Secretary of War read to the Senate urging these very estimates which he transmitted?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say there is nothing here on the face of the paper showing that it comes from him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not have his letter printed with the estimates because it had been already read to the Senate and printed in the debates. I had simply the detailed estimate printed; that is all; but here is the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. FESSENDEN. February 11, 1864, transmitting these very papers, and urging that the appropriations be made according to the estimates. Of course we should never have acted, and the Senator would not as a member of the Committee on Finance, upon simply an estimate from the bureau without its coming with the indorsement of the head of the Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it seems that on the 11th of February the Secretary of War transmitted these estimates, but why could they not have come to us through the regular channel? As I said before, I will not in time of war resist these appropriations; but if it was an ordinary time I would, simply because the ordinary checks are not thrown around these estimates. They are not submitted to us in the proper way, and in the mode contemplated by law. As I said before, I do not believe the Secretary of War would authorize or permit in his Department any improper expenditures. He is watchful, I think strict, and in several cases has inflicted severe and, no doubt, deserved punishment on those guilty of improper practices in the disbursement of money. I have no complaint to make of him except that this mode of submitting estimates to us is not, certainly, the proper one, and in ordinary times I would insist that they should be rejected until they came to us through the proper channel.

Take the estimate for the bureau of the Surgeon General. A year ago we appropriated money for this Department upon the basis of one million of men. A carefully-prepared estimate was made by Surgeon General Hammond showing that seven dollars per man was required to provide the necessary surgery and medicine for an army. Seven dollars a man was more than was provided in any other service. He went on to give the reasons why in our service a great deal more was required, and upon what basis we made an appropriation of $7,000,000. It has been exhausted, or nearly so, and the additional appropriation made by this amendment is $3,379,000. I do not see how we can check this expenditure, because the mode and manner in which the estimates are submitted to us do not give us the necessary details.

We are told so much is required for bedding and hospital stores—$1,210,000 deficiency estimated for this and that; but the way in which these deficiencies are arrived at is by taking the amount that has been expended up say to the 1st of February, divided by the number of months, and then making an estimate upon the same basis for future expenditure. There is no other mode adopted by them, and perhaps none other necessary; but this same mode of estimate might have been adopted just as well at the beginning of the session as at this present time.

I make these remarks merely to correct the misapprehension into which the Senator from Maine evidently fell the other day, that this all grew out of the proclamation of the President, while only a small portion of it comparatively grows out of that, and also to say a word at least of disapprobation as to the mode of submitting to us estimates for such large deficiencies.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next reserved amendment was to insert at the end of section two the following:

And that after the close of the present fiscal year the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the several Departments shall be $3,000 per annum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to take the sense of the Senate, without saying a word about it, whether we will insert "five hundred" after "three thousand," so as to let them all stand alike at $3,500.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is done, I apprehend it increases an appropriation, and I submit to the chairman of the committee if that amendment can properly come unless from a committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is a distinct question of legislation. It does not appropriate anything.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If you add $500 to each salary, it will be necessary to increase the appropriation, and I should like to know from the Senator from Wisconsin what the increase will be. How many Assistant Secretaries are there? It will certainly add several thousand dollars. There are several Assistant Postmasters General, I think.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It does not appropriate a cent. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire was made providing that after the end of this fiscal year the salaries shall be fixed at a given sum, but it does not appropriate a dollar, and in fact it has reduced the salary of two, as I understand. As there is a general desire to put them on a footing of equality, this would fix their salaries, not appropriating a dollar, at $3,500. It certainly is not out of order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the President rule on the point of order raised by the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the impression of the Chair, the amendment is in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose it is competent to amend that amendment under the ruling of the Chair, so as to propose that the salaries of other persons in the Government be raised also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not in this stage, because this is an amendment to an amendment, and it is not amendable in the third degree.

The yeas and yeas being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wiley, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the salary of the heads of bureaus be raised $500 each. I want it put in the same words as the other amendment, so as to apply from the end of the present fiscal year. I think they are quite as much entitled to it, and labor quite as hard as the Assistant Secretaries.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate will be aware that this will reduce the salary of the Comptroller of the Currency and some others.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. This adds $500 to all the heads of bureaus, and does not reduce anybody.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that the language?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I want to inquire for information whether this includes the Comptrollers of the Treasury—whether they are included under the general expression "heads of bureaus."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know.

Mr. HALE. I move to add the Comptroller, then.

Mr. SHERMAN. And so of the Auditors.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire as part of mine, to include the Auditors of the Treasury and the Comptrollers.

Mr. POMEROY. I think you had better put in the clerks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can do that afterwards.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Illinois on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That carries the bill along with it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest the better way probably now is to adopt the pending amendment. That will let the matter go over and we shall have the same fight over again to-morrow or the next day, because I assure the Senate that an increase of the salaries of this class of officers will only bring upon the Senate and upon the other House every officer in this Government, at least every officer in the city of Washington. If you commence now at the head you will have to run clear down to the foot. I hope therefore that some Senator who voted for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin will move a reconsideration and let us have a vote on the subject, because this involves a general increase of salaries, and if we grant it to this particular class we cannot refuse it to others.

Mr. FOOT. I will move to reconsider the vote by which the salary of the Assistant Secretaries was raised from $3,000 to $3,500. The vote was a very close one, and there is a decided difference of opinion as to the policy of it. I move a reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Vermont is in order, and the first question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the vote will not be reconsidered. I prefer that we should vote down the main amendment. Let it stand as it is, and then I have great confidence that it will be voted down. With the addition of $500 now added, I think we can vote it down, and that will be the shortest mode of disposing of it. It is legislation in regard to the future, in regard to the next year. It does not belong to an appropriation bill anyway, and least of all does it seem to me to belong to an appropriation bill at the present time, when none of us can tell what will be on the morrow emphatically, much less what will be next year. Let us take care of this year if we can, and let next year be taken care of by wiser men than we are now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was suggested by the Senator from Ohio that the vote of the Senate already caused an increase of salaries. I desire to say in reply to that that I do not so understand it. I desired to see such a result some time ago, but the Senate has now decided to reduce some Assistant Secretaries to $3,500 and to raise others to $3,500, being a reduction equivalent to the increase. It may be ten hundred or fifteen hundred or five hundred dollars difference, but it is very trifling. The vote of the Senate thus far has been an effort to do justice among men whose services and position are the same and whose salaries are different. That is the way I look at it, and therefore I hope it will not be undone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was about to ask the Senator from Vermont who made the motion to reconsider whether the question should not be taken directly on the amendment as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question of reconsideration is first in order.

Mr. HOWE. I have not said a word on this subject, and I have been recording my votes here differently from what I usually vote on questions of this kind. I have been voting for the purpose and in the hope of equalizing these salaries, and for the purpose and in the hope of getting them fixed at a fair and just rate. I voted for the proposition to raise the salaries from $3,000 to $3,500, and I did so upon the belief that this Government can afford to pay $3,500 for a year's work of such a man as is fit to fill the place of an Assistant Secretary. The duties with which that officer is charged are almost the same as those with which the Secretaries themselves are charged, and at times may be precisely the same, because in the absence of the heads of Departments they act in their place. We pay the Secretary $8,000, and the substitute for the Secretary, it seems to me, should be paid as high as $3,500. The men who are fit for those places can command these salaries in any other department of life; and hard pressed as is the Republic at the present time, I do not believe that it is reduced to the condition of a mendicant, or that it is called upon to rely upon the charities of our fellow-citizens to do its work. A just sum the Government can afford to pay, and an unjust sum we never can afford to pay any more in time of peace than in time of war. For that reason I voted for the $3,500, and I shall vote for it again.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, resulted—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Foster, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sausbury, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote adopting Mr. DOOLITTLE's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, which was to insert at the end of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole the following:

And that the salaries of each of the heads of bureaus, including the Auditors and Comptrollers, after the end of the present fiscal year shall be increased the sum of $500 each.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that amendment will prevail. There is evident fitness in fixing these salaries equally. It will save a vast amount of trouble to the Senate. We shall be besieged day in and day out, year after year, until it is done. Let us do it at once and have no further trouble. Fix them all alike at $3,500, and then Congress will be permitted to rest a while from the importunities of these suffering heads of bureaus.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply suggest that as it stands now it raises one to $4,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether the proposition of the Senator from Illinois is not an independent one, which ought not to be hung on to the proposition that the Senate has adopted. It is not really an amendment or modification of that, but an original proposition relating to other officers, and ought not to be made an amendment to this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to have it understood why I have offered this proposition. I was opposed to increasing the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries. I thought this a wrong time to commence an increase of salaries. The Senate, however, have decided differently, and have determined that it is a proper time to increase salaries, by a yeas and nays vote. They have refused to reconsider that vote. It is manifest, therefore, that a majority of the Senate are in favor of increasing the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of the various Departments. How many this will embrace I do not know. What the sum required to meet this additional appropriation will be, the Senator from Wisconsin who moved it has not informed us. I do not know how many Comptrollers and Auditors and heads of bureaus there may be, without a computation, but there is certainly as much reason for increasing their salaries as for increasing the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries. These Assistant Secretaries are new officers in the Government. We have been able to get along without them until recently. There is, as has been remarked by some Senator, no class of officers in this Government who are laboring more hours in the day and more efficiently than the Comptrollers and Auditors and the heads of the different bureaus in the various Departments. The war has thrown immense labors upon these officers. They are responsible positions; and if we are to increase the salaries of any officers, then I am for increasing the salaries of these officers; and though I would be opposed to the increase of any, I am for adding this to the amendment, so that if any salaries are increased we shall increase the salaries of these deserving ones.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the honorable Senator from Illinois if he will not accept, as a part of his amendment, the following:

And that the pay of paymasters' clerks in the Navy shall be made equal to the pay of paymasters' clerks in the Army.

They ought to be equalized; they are now unequal, very unequal; and the paymasters' clerks in the Navy have as responsible positions, and I believe do as much work, and are subjected to quite as great expense as the paymasters' clerks in the Army. As it seems to be a time when we are all disposed to act equitably and give persons performing the same service the same compensation, I hope the Senator from Illinois will be willing to accept this as a part of his amendment; I cannot move it, of course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be a very proper amendment after this is voted on.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Senator from Illinois will listen to the appeal made to him by the Senator from Connecticut. These are a class of very worthy people who have been laboring for the Government at very inadequate salary for many years, and only get about five hundred dollars a year; and some, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] tells me, get only $400. It is utterly impossible for them to maintain their families and maintain themselves respectably on such a salary. It is a case that I think appeals to the humanity of the Senator from Illinois which it will be utterly impossible for him to resist.

Mr. HALE. I am not surprised at all these motions and all these attempts to defeat this measure, which I think is the ultimate tendency and object of these motions.

The Senate, I rather think for the first time since the foundation of the Federal Government, has voted to diminish in a small degree the salaries of these officials. I think it is a new era in the history of the Government, and I do not wonder that gentlemen, particularly those who are conservative in the temper of their minds, are stirred up and horrified, and that they see infinite mischief in this measure. For myself I do not look at it so. I think it is a rational and a convenient step. If it would only be followed up, and the Senate would not be frightened at it, it would do good. I had almost a mind to move an adjournment, so that we might live one night under the effect of a vote of the Senate to reduce salaries.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the aggregate it increases them.

Mr. HALE. I know it increases them in the aggregate, but still there was a tendency to cut down some of them. Two salaries are cut down.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Which are they?

Mr. HALE. I do not know. I do not think I can throw any light on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. The economy which so gratifies the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, is of a very queer kind. The amendment proposes, it is true, to reduce the salaries of two officers—not this year, by the way—from $4,000 to $3,500 after this year; and as a part of that economy, to put up some dozen or more that now receive $3,000 to $3,500.

Mr. HALE. I voted against that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is upon the measure as it stands that the honorable Senator is congratulating the Senate, and thinking that we are exhibiting a spectacle of Roman virtue here never before seen in the American Senate, because we are disposed to cut down salaries. It is cutting down with one hand and putting up with two.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Howard, Trumbull, and Wade—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—35.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend so as to fix the salary of the First Assistant Postmaster General at $3,500.

Mr. GRIMES. He comes within it now.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the amendment agreed to only regulates the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries. I propose to amend it so as to fix the salary of the First Assistant Postmaster General at $3,500.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not all?

Mr. HOWE. Because others stand in a different position.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Second Assistant Postmaster General has most important duties.

Mr. HOWE. The First Assistant is the deputy of the Postmaster General as I understand. He is the assistant of the Postmaster General. He is the one who takes the place of the Postmaster General in his absence, and I do not understand such is the fact of the others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment is to add after "Assistant Secretaries" the words "and the First Assistant Postmaster General."

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—yeas twenty-five, nays not counted.

Mr. GRIMES. If we are going into the Post Office Department, there is a very valuable officer, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who, I understand, from what I know of the Post Office Department, has a great deal of business to do; he is the most responsible assistant there; the one who has charge of the contract office. I propose to include the Second Assistant Postmaster General also.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to add the Third Assistant Postmaster General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not in order, as this is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—25.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, to amend the amendment by inserting "the Second Assistant Postmaster General."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now returns on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Add to the second section:

And that after the close of the present fiscal year the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries and the First Assistant Postmaster General shall be $3,500 per annum.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Willey, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—17.

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. The title of the bill was amended by adding "and for other purposes."

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate adjourned.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 79; as follows:

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. A. W. CLARK, was confined to his room by sickness.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 55.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which has now charge of the subject.

Debate was objected to.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. So the resolution was adopted. During the vote, Mr. EDGERTON said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the gentleman from New York, Mr. KALBFLEISCH, is detained in Brooklyn as a witness in an important suit against the city of Brooklyn, for the recovery of the value of property destroyed at the Atlantic docks by rioters in July last.

Mr. ALLEY, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and to move that it be made a special order for the 23d of this month, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. STILES. I object to its being made a special order.

The SPEAKER. The majority can make an appropriation bill a special order on any day.

The bill was received, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be made a special order for the 23d of February, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the select committee on the subject a national bankrupt law.

Objection was made and afterwards withdrawn.

The bill was received, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND WARRANTS HELD BY STATES.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of March 2, 1855, as to authorize States having warrants, scrip, or certificates to locate them; and where there are no lands in said States upon which to locate the same, to locate them upon any lands subject to private entry in any other State or Territory; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GRINNELL. I object to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of such legislation as shall deal with all confiscated lands in the rebel States and lands sold for non-payment of taxes as public lands of the United States, which shall be parceled out into suitable homesteads among those who shall have aided in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. BLISS. I object.

INCREASE OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That in consequence of the increased expense of living and the depreciation in the value of the national currency, it is the opinion of the House that the compensation paid to the officers and soldiers in the Army and Navy of the United States should be increased about thirty-three per cent; and that the Committee on Military Affairs are hereby instructed to report to this House at an early day a bill for that purpose.

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 122 to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and to ask that they now be considered.

Mr. STILES. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have indicated. I do not propose to call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ought not the amendments of the Senate to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend that rule in order that the amendments of the Senate may be considered in the House. I do not propose to call for the previous question, and it will be a great saving of time to consider them in the House.

Mr. STILES. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I renew the objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were suspended, and the amendments of the Senate to the internal revenue bill were received.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in those amendments of the Senate, which I will explain in a few remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to have a motion to non-concur and for a committee of conference entered before the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I will state in a very few words the difference between the two bills. It will be recollected that the Committee of Ways and Means recommended that after the 12th of January, the time the bill was reported, all whisky distilled and sold, or removed for sale, should pay forty cents per gallon in addition to the present tax of twenty cents. The House, on motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] changed that so as to put the tax upon all the stock on hand, without reference to the time when the same was distilled, or whether it had been taxed or not. The House adopted that amendment, and in that shape the bill was sent to the Senate.

There was a further amendment by which the same tax was placed upon all liquors which had been imported and which were on hand. A new tax was also to be laid upon cotton which had once paid a tax, and not simply that which should be produced in the future.

Such was the bill which we sent to the Senate, and it was entirely changed, in principle, from the bill reported to the House by the Committee of Ways and Means, which was entirely prospective in its nature. The Senate acted upon the bill, and they, in short, amended the bill so that it should be entirely prospective—that from the time of the passage of the bill up to the 1st of July the tax should be sixty cents per gallon on all manufactured; from July to January, seventy cents; and after January, eighty cents.

The difference, therefore, rests upon the question of the time when the tax shall be laid, and upon the amount of the tax, as a permanent law. It changes, as I said before, the time when the additional forty cents is to take effect on that which is on hand, without regard to when distilled and whether it has paid a tax or not; and also as to all that which is distilled and sold, or removed for sale, after the passage of the bill. They then increased the tax from July ten cents more than the House bill put upon it; and then after January next ten cents more—in all, twenty cents more than the House bill provided for.

The question now is whether the House will accept the amendments of the Senate, or will adhere to their own bill. The Committee of Ways and Means are clearly of opinion that the House ought to accept the Senate bill, first, because it is more consistent with the principles of taxation adopted by this and every other Government in laying a tax upon future products, and because it is consistent with the pledge which Congress made to the community at the time they passed the tax law. They adopted, after the most considerate deliberation and extensive debate in this House, the principle of prospective taxation upon every article which shall be taxed. After that the committee is of opinion that there was such a pledge of the House as to the principle of taxation that every manufacturer had a right to rely upon it, and to arrange and carry on his business upon the faith of it. We thought he had a right to manufacture in any branch, whether it be whisky or cotton goods, or any other thing which may be affected by the principle of taxation, under the tax then imposed, until a law should be passed imposing a prospective tax upon all future products. The committee is of opinion that no man will complain of the amount of tax which is laid on him, if it be necessary for the purpose of revenue, provided it be prospective, so that a man can shape his business and arrange his affairs to meet it. And although the prospective tax of the Senate is very heavy—certainly after the 1st of January—yet, as there is no implied faith violated, and there will be time for all distillers to prepare either to proceed with their business under that tax or discontinue it, no injustice will be done thereby.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman if the Senate amendments do away with the provision of the House, that whisky on hand shall be subject to an additional tax?

Mr. STEVENS. Whisky on hand is subject to only the old duty.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I cannot support the Senate amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. Of course I did not suppose the gentleman would. The committee placed themselves upon the ground of justice to manufacturers who were pursuing a lawful business, one sanctioned by the country, and one forbidden by no law.

But we think, sir, that as a revenue measure, the bill from the Senate is much better than the one which the House sent to them, a bill which imposed an immediate additional tax of forty cents upon all whisky on hand, whether it were distilled in 1858, 1859, or 1860, which was expressly exempt by our former law, or whether it were distilled since. The House bill laid a tax of forty cents more upon that whisky.

Sir, it is estimated by those who are best acquainted with this subject, that the amount of liquor now on hand, if it could all be got at, which would be subject to the new tax, is at the extremest point two hundred thousand barrels, or about ten million gallons; for although a barrel holds but forty gallons, yet as the proof is generally above first proof, it is estimated by calculation that the two hundred thousand barrels on hand would make ten million gallons. If forty cents were to be laid upon that, it would raise $4,000,000 upon the stock now on hand.

But I suppose that there is nobody who has seen the operation of our tax laws, and who knows how easy it is now to evade this new tax upon that which has gone into every man's cellar or storehouse, who supposes that more than half of it would be taxed. I calculate, therefore, that the extremest amount which would be produced by the House bill would be $2,000,000.

Now, sir, although that amount would not be reached by the Senate bill, yet from its passage up to the 1st of July there would be an additional tax of ten cents more upon the amount which is proposed to be laid by the House bill; that is, fifty cents in addition to what is now laid. I will not take into account how much would be probably manufactured in that time. From that time to the 1st of January there would be twenty cents in addition laid, making seventy cents more than is laid by the House bill; and all that is produced between those two periods, being probably thirty million gallons, would pay twenty cents in addition. Now that additional twenty cents would produce more between this and the 1st of January than the whole amount we would get by taxing the amount on hand—I speak of the increased amount between forty and seventy cents.

Then, after the 1st of January, comes the tax of eighty cents per gallon, which, if you lay it upon what is estimated as the product in this country, sixty-six or seventy million gallons, would produce between forty and fifty million dollars annually. The tax being imposed upon the distillers, nearly all of that amount would be made subject to taxation, and instead of getting some thirty million we should get forty-eight or fifty million dollars when this bill came into full operation; that would take place on the 1st of January next. In the mean time it would injure nobody. The distillers who have now grain on hand, or have cattle and hogs on hand, would go on and run out their stock at the ten cents increase, and provide for future operations as the interests of the country might require.

We know, sir, by the prices-current that the tax laid by this House when the bill was last before it—I speak of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD]—caused whisky to sink immediately in the city of New York twenty-five cents a gallon and in the city of Chicago thirty cents a gallon, and that corn fell from twenty to twenty-five cents in the western country. That is a fact of record as the effect of that unfortunate amendment, affecting, as it did, the large distillers who had sent on to New York for sale and had it in the hands of their correspondents there. There was a large amount of it disposed of in that way. Speculators, it is true, had some, but not a large amount. And they were legitimate speculators according to the laws of the country, and are no more obnoxious to the censure of the House than any man who buys a farm to-day for $100 an acre and sells it to-morrow for $150 an acre.

Now, one thing is to be considered. I learn that at Peoria, Illinois, there are several distillers who distill a hundred barrels a day, and are constantly sending it to their correspondents in New York. In the present state of transportation by rail they inform me it takes forty days after the whisky is embarked to reach its place of destination, where it is deposited, not as sold, but, under the law, for sale. Now, there are therefore four thousand barrels of liquor from each of those distilleries in transitu each day, passing from their distilleries to their correspondents in New York. All that is to be affected by the House bill, as well as the stock which they had on hand in New York. The amount which would be lost by it is almost incalculable. One distiller, a candid, honest man, told me that the difference to him would be $140,000; and that loss would be without any fault of his own. He had manufactured his stock on the faith of what he supposed to be the policy of the Government, and he had honestly kept it, either in his own hands or in the storehouses of his correspondents. I suppose that every member has discussed this matter in all its bearings since the last time the question was before the House.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, stated the positions of the two bills. It will be for the House to say what it believes to be the most proper course for it to pursue, and what the most profitable for the revenue of the country. The Committee of Ways and Means has no doubt that the Senate bill is not only the fairest and most faithful bill, but that it will produce much more revenue in the coming year.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is on concurrence with the amendments made by the Senate to House bill No. 122. It is whether the House shall adhere to its amendment to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, or whether we shall recede from it. The effect of the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is therefore practically to restrict the revenue proposed to be raised by the bill. Sir, this is the most extraordinary proposition, coming from the quarter it does. We are in the midst of a most expensive and exhausting war. Our receipts from all sources are far below our expenditures. The Government is dependent on its credit and not on its legitimate revenues for the payment of its ordinary contingent expenses. This House, with a proper sense of the propriety of this species of legislation, which looks to a legitimate source of revenue as contradistinguished from a revenue by the expansion of Government credit, adopted an amendment against the remonstrance of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means which would increase the revenue, not, as has been just said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, $1,000,000, but would increase it instantly at least ten million dollars.

Admitting that this article of spirits is a legitimate subject for taxation, it is a very extraordinary spectacle to see the Committee of Ways and Means opposing a proposition which is to take from the hands of monopolists and speculators forty cents a gallon on the stock on hand, and put it into the public Treasury. Those whose duty it is to protect the public interest have not thronged the avenues to this Hall. They have not button-holed members of the two committees of both Houses of Congress. Gentlemen connected with the Committee of Ways and Means on the one hand and of the Finance Committee on the other have not been button-holed by those who desire to protect the public interest or the public Treasury, but by those who are looking for the protection of their individual interests to the exclusion of the public interest. And it is from that quarter, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman gets his data and his facts which he has just presented to the House. He says that there are only two hundred and fifty thousand barrels to be affected by the amendment. Why, sir, I can name three men in the city of New York who own almost half that quantity themselves, neither of whom is a merchant or a legitimate trader in any article of merchandise or production whatever. As I said on a previous occasion, I repeat here now, that in advance of the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in advance of any official publication of the deficit of the revenue arising from this article, in advance of any conclusion on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in advance of the assembling of Congress, persons not distillers, not traders, not merchants, but politicians, who have no other trade or occupation, were in possession of information that enabled them to purchase whisky at forty-six cents a gallon, which went up in November to sixty-one cents a gallon, and in the month of December to ninety-two cents a gallon.

These are facts, Mr. Speaker, and facts are worth all the specious arguments and all the false representations and interested statements of parties who have been caught in their attempts to defraud the Treasury by monopolizing an article on which the necessities of the Government require a heavy tax to be imposed. Therefore, sir, instead of two hundred and fifty thousand barrels, I repeat there are four times that amount to be affected, which would produce an income of at least ten million dollars immediately to the revenue.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that the distillers are to be affected. I contend that the reverse is the case; and I think there is no difficulty in showing that the reverse is the fact. If you pass these Senate amendments you will have a million barrels in market that have paid this twenty cents a gallon. That will be in the market at forty cents a gallon less than the manufacturer will be able to produce it. The distiller cannot compete with the holders of stock until that quantity has been sold, because upon every gallon sixty cents has to be paid in the way of revenue, whereas one million barrels in existence has to pay twenty cents. Therefore it is the interest of the honest distiller that his production should be put upon a level with that of monopolists and large operators.

Sir, we have one bank in the city of New York that has advanced $250,000 to persons to buy up whisky in advance of this tax. That is a fact. But we are also told that there is no precedent for this legislation. That is rung in my ears by gentlemen from New York who are interested in this whisky speculation, that the English Government has never done so. There are many things we could imitate with advantage in English legislation, and this thing of direct tax may be one of them. The English Parliament did place an increased tax upon spirits on hand. It was done in the year 1860. By reference to the Statutes General of Great Britain for 1860, it will be seen that a like objection was obviated without difficulty. On the 29th of February an act was passed levying duties upon certain goods and commodities. On the 17th of July, in the same year, an act was passed increasing the duties upon the same articles. And then, to obviate the difficulty in respect to contracts previously made, the following provision was enacted:

"And whereas contracts or agreements may have been made for the sale or delivery of some of the goods or commodities on which increased or additional duties of excise are by this act granted and imposed, which contracts or agreements may have been made with no reference to such additional duties, and thereby the several contractors may be materially affected; for remedy thereof,

"Be it enacted, That every person who shall have made or entered into any such contract or agreement, shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, in the case of any such contract or agreement, to add so much money as will be equivalent to the increased or additional duty hereby granted on such goods or commodities respectively to the price thereof, and shall be entitled by virtue of this act to be paid, and to sue and recover the same accordingly."

Can it be said because Congress has levied one dollar tax upon any specific article, no matter what may be the public necessities, that article cannot be subjected to an additional tax? That doctrine is entirely inconsistent with the practice of this country and Great Britain.

The amendments of the Senate in some respects may be an improvement upon the House bill; but so far as they refuse to concur in the provision to place the tax upon the stock upon hand they are wrong, they are unfair and unjust to the manufacturer. They are a fraud upon the honest trader. They are improper so far as collecting revenue is concerned, and in my judgment this House should not concur in them. We take our position here for the public good. The Government wanted revenue, when the Committee of Ways and Means fixed upon this article from which to derive it. They brought in a bill which upon its face places in the hands of those who have improperly obtained information over ten million dollars—places that amount in the hands of speculators, which would otherwise go into the Treasury. The House non-concurred in that provision of the Committee of Ways and Means by a majority of forty, and it is now for us to determine whether one branch of Congress shall do the legislation for both branches; whether we are to be rebuked and held up before the world as incompetent and incapable legislators; whether, in other words, the Constitution is to be subverted which places into both Houses of Congress equal rights and equal powers? That is the subject on which we are now to act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of justice, as a matter of proper legislation, as a matter of House pride, I hope that we will stand firm in the position we have taken with so much unanimity, or rather with such a large majority, and refuse to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a communication from a member who is absent on account of illness, which will be read if there be no objection. It will take up about five minutes.

A MEMBER. Who is the letter from?

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LOVEJOY.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I desire to express the hope that the amendment to the internal revenue bill taxing liquors will not be allowed to remain. I trust the House will concur in the Senate amendments. The more I reflect upon the subject, and the more I become acquainted with the facts, the more I am convinced that this retroactive tax is unjust, impolitic, and destructive of the ends which it apparently is intended to secure. It will require a number of tax-gatherers equal to the frogs which invaded the chambers and kneading troughs of the Egyptians. You will have to visit the cross-roads to find the retailers and gauge their half-sold barrel of whisky, and extort, it may be, a few dollars, and receive multiplied execrations gratis.

The highest amount anticipated from this process is, I believe, $5,000,000. The city of Peoria alone, if you allow the distillers to go on under the law as amended in the Senate, will give you $7,000,000, and my whole district $9,000,000. This large amount, double, and in the estimation of good judges more than three times the amount which you can get from retaxing the amount on hand, will be virtually lost to the Government, for the distillers cannot for any long time carry on their manufactures under this capricious and ever-changing legislation. If this new tax is sprung upon them now they will anticipate a similar process at the next session of Congress; they will therefore be afraid to buy the raw material when its product is subject to this retroactive legislation. What would you think of the farmer who having drawn a full and foaming pail of milk from his cow, should look covetously upon it as he takes it to the milk house and determine to return immediately and obtain another? The kindest animal would get restive and kick under such an exhaustive process. If he will only wait until night and let his cow have grass and water and time he can get his bucket refilled. So, if the Government will deal fairly and justly with these distillers, it will get a large revenue, paid in promptly and cheerfully, but if it attempts this exhaustive process of renewed and double taxation it will receive plenty of kicks and but a scanty revenue. I state this as my honest, candid conviction, and I entreat the House to review its action and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

As to the policy of the measure I will not dwell upon that, but satisfy myself with saying that it appears to me to be one of the most impolitic things that could possibly be done; that if it could be carried into execution—which I believe to be impossible—it would be one of the most odious measures that could possibly be adopted. I have no doubt that was the purpose of the mover. It is the wily Greek bringing the wooden horse into Troy. "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

The wise man has said, "in vain is the snare set in the sight of any bird." I hope the House will not be unwise enough to step into a trap that really has no concealment. I trust the House will forgive the seeming egotism of these remarks. I do not distrust its wisdom or its patriotism, but representing a district so largely interested in this subject, I beg the indulgence of submitting these few words to be placed on record, for they are in accordance with my very clear and honest convictions.

Pending the reading of the above, the following discussion occurred:

Mr. HOLMAN, (interrupting.) I desire to suggest that this communication be not read, but be printed as the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that this argument of my colleague, who is confined to his house by sickness, will be read; and then I want to have it answered by a paper which I have in my hand.

Mr. COX. I gave my consent to the reading of that paper only under the idea that it was an excuse for the member's absence.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair stated to the House, as he supposed distinctly, that its reading would occupy five minutes, or less than five minutes.

Mr. COX. The Speaker did not state what it was. I move that its further reading be dispensed with.

THE SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio say that he was deceived by the statement of the Chair?

Mr. COX. I think there will be no objection to printing the paper.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is upon the floor, has yielded to me. Out of courtesy to my colleague, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] with whom I differ to celo upon this question, I will have his communication read, and allow it to come out of my time.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will rule, if the gentleman from Ohio says he has been deceived by the statement of the Chair—

Mr. COX. I will not say that the Chair has ever deceived me upon any subject. I withdraw my motion to dispense with the reading.

Mr. SWEAT. It is very evident that the members on this side of the House did get a wrong impression from the remarks of the Speaker. I did for one, most assuredly. I do not think this is the time for letters to be sent here and read upon matters of this kind.

The Clerk resumed and finished the reading of the communication.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in reply to the remarks which my colleague has had read; but I propose to have a tract read which I hold in my hand, and which I think answers pretty much all he has said.

There are some things, however, in my colleague's remarks to which I will allude, and which I have heard a great deal about from other sources, and that is the source from which this proposition to tax whisky on hand comes. I am not in the habit of looking at that so particularly; I look at the thing itself, and judge whether the thing be or be not in itself correct. It makes no difference with me who is the author of the provision.

A word, too, in relation to this trap, this snare, which has been set for us country gentlemen, we who occupy back seats in this House, and who are not supposed to know much about legislation. Sir, I supposed that this matter of taxing liquors on hand was one of the simplest propositions ever presented to this House. It was, as I said when the proposition was made, merely the question in a nutshell, whether we should put this forty cents per gallon into the Treasury of the United States or let it go into the hands of the speculators; and, sir, the people through their representatives here, the men who are the guardians of the people's interests, have by a vote nearly two to one, recorded themselves in favor of this tax, and in favor of the policy and the justness of it. I am aware of the great efforts which have been made—the successful efforts which have been made elsewhere—since this provision passed the House, to sink this bill. And it is to be seen by the vote to be taken here whether those efforts have been equally successful in this House. I ask, as a part of my speech, that this tract which comes from Illinois, and which was got up in that State which is said to be so largely interested in this question, may be read; and I ask the House to listen attentively to its reading.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Reasons for taxing all Highwines and Alcohol sold after date.

Will the Congress of the United States, because of special pleading of speculators, violate the Government's contract with the manufacturer of highwines, and with the people, who, in consuming the wines, pay the tax—submitted to by them because it (the tax) would go into their (the United States) Treasury?

It is asserted by the opponents to a tax being laid on wines on hand, that in doing so the Government violates a contract. But as the violation of contract is really the argument advanced, let us see the results of an investigation of the original law, and how it can be violated.

The original law enacts that any person may manufacture highwines if said person will pay a tax of twenty cents per gallon on every gallon made by him or them. It does not say "on every gallon sold," but on every gallon distilled, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale. Neither does Government, by any provision, provide to reduce such tax of twenty cents per gallon in cases where the consumption or demand will not, by its market price, enable the distiller to save himself from loss. Not at all. On the contrary, the bond is twenty cents for every gallon made, and in case it is not paid, then confiscation of the distiller's property, or his bondsmen's, until it is paid. In making this contract the Government assures the distiller protection against dishonest competitors in distilling, who, from fraud in not paying the tax, can sell his wines so low as to drive the honest distiller from his business. If any contract exists between the Government and any one in highwines, it is clearly stated above to be between the manufacturer on one part and Government on the other—being the manufacturer agreeing to pay (not the consumer) to Government twenty cents on every gallon made, and in consideration Government agreeing to protect him in his rights against all competition, both foreign and native.

Government never made a contract with the speculator in wines or with the consumer of wines that they would not tax wines on hand; but they did agree that they would protect the manufacturer in his legitimate business. This being so, what will be the result of an increased tax on wines made after date, and no increase of tax on wines on hand, or sold after date?

Will not the distiller be compelled to suspend his distillery until the stock of wines on hand is consumed? Can he manufacture wines and pay Government sixty cents per gallon tax when the stock on hand can be sold, from non-taxation, at five, ten, or twenty cents less than his costs him after paying the tax? This being so, does not Government violate its contract with the manufacturer by raising the tax on his products so as to stop his distillery, lose his "half-fed stock," and lose the business in which he invested, under a contract with Government, his money? And must he now be deprived of his rights because of a combination of speculators having banded together to rob the consumers by an increased prospective tax, and to make the Government rob itself and the people by enacting such law, and for which the Senate committee plead with reasons as follows:

1. That the amount to be collected on would "not be worth the candle."

"As the amount on hand is only some two hundred and fifty thousand barrels, which would give, at forty cents, some five million, or if even double, ten million dollars, would not warrant the trouble; and that the information which was laid before the committee, and on which the committee acted and made the recommendation, has been obtained from parties opposed to taxing wines on hand. This is an honest admission."

2. That it would be establishing a precedent in taxation entirely new. I am told "that it has never been done in England," "on authority." "I have not personally examined it myself, because I was told there was no doubt of the fact." From his obtaining the information that the stock on hand was two hundred and fifty thousand (which does not exceed one fourth of the stock on hand) from parties opposed to the tax, is it not fair to infer that this last information was obtained from the same authority, for the fact is that the English Parliament did place an increased tax on all spirits on hand? It was done in the year 1860. By reference to the Statutes General of Great Britain for 1860 it will be seen that a like objection was obviated without difficulty. On the 29th of February an act was passed levying duties upon certain goods and commodities. On the 17th of July, in the same year, an act was passed increasing the duties upon the same articles. And then, to obviate the difficulty in respect to contracts previously made, the following provision was enacted:

"And whereas contracts or agreements may have been made for the sale or delivery of some of the goods or commodities on which increased or additional duties of excise are by this act granted and imposed, which contracts or agreements may have been made with no reference to such additional duties, and thereby the several contractors may be materially affected; for remedy thereof,

"Be it enacted, That every person who shall have made or entered into any such contract or agreement shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, in the case of any such contract or agreement, to add so much money as will be equivalent to the increased or additional duty hereby granted on such goods or commodities respectively to the price thereof, and shall be entitled, by virtue of this act, to be paid, and to sue and recover the same accordingly."

If information was wanted why not apply to the proper source—the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—who could (or ought to be able to) furnish him with the number and capacity of each distillery per day; which would, by simply multiplying the product of number and capacity per day with the number of days from September 1, 1863, to the 4th, give the quantity made; which, by dividing by two, would give the quantity on hand.

The Government has no right to violate a contract made with the consumers, which was, "if you will enable the distiller to make wines—by your paying the tax—we will see that such tax shall be applied to the payment of your debts, and not into the pockets of speculators."

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. When the vote was taken in the House the other day upon this bill I voted in the negative; and I did so because I was opposed to the principle of retrospective action in legislation. I am in favor of raising revenue for the Government to the fullest extent the necessities of the country may require; but I wish to do it on some principle which shall not unsettle the manufacturing and producing interests of the country.

Legislation should be uniform; it should be just; and I insist that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] the other day is not a just or a proper amendment. It injuriously affects the interest of those who hold property which has been manufactured and which has paid to the Government every penny of duty which the revenue law demanded. When you unexpectedly add a new duty, and go back and retax that which has paid a tax, and which has been bought in the market at the market price, you commit an act of injustice and oppression, and establish a precedent which will be dangerous to every producing interest throughout the land. I voted against the bill because it contained such a provision; and why the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] voted against the bill, containing his own amendment, is a question for him to decide, not for me.

It has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that the vote in this House indicated the disposition and determination of the House to stand by the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] It may have done so; yet when the gentleman pronounces that amendment an act of wisdom, I cannot agree with him. The legislation of this country should foster our producing interests. It should show the manufacturers that while we call for money from all classes of society, we design to call for it upon principles which shall be uniform and just to all men; and I declare that there is no justice in reaching back to that which has once paid its duty to reimpose another tax before the article which has already paid duty has gone into the market.

Sir, I suppose the distillers in the State of New York are under contracts for a large amount of spirits to be delivered in future. They are under contract at a specific price. They have bought their material, their corn or other grain, at market prices at the time of purchase, and they are under bonds to deliver on the 1st day of May, or June, or July, a specific amount of liquor or spirits. And now, sir, the Government comes in in the night-time without notice to them, and imposes an additional tax of forty cents a gallon upon that which they are bound to deliver without reference to that duty! Is there any justice in that?

Sir, if this principle were applied to other branches of manufacture, how would it operate? This people have the sovereign right in their legislation to impose a specific tax on cloth or upon any other article produced, and yet will you say that it would be wise, after a man had gone into that manufacture, after he had bought his materials in the market at the market price, paying the duty then existing to this Government, that this Government should come in and lay another duty which may entirely unsettle the market? There is no safety in such a kind of legislation.

This, sir, is a measure for revenue, and although some gentlemen in this House, I know, would like to act upon it as a prohibitory measure, they should remember that this bill is not for prohibition but for revenue, and revenue alone. I have heard members upon this floor, not publicly but privately, say that they want to kill the manufacture of spirits, and they, perhaps, will unite with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] in this kind of legislation; but I tell them that we cannot in this way legislate a man into morality any more than we can legislate him into heaven. This is not a moral question. It is a question of revenue, and we want to lay this tax in such a way as not to destroy the producing interests from which the revenue must come.

Gentlemen appeal to precedents abroad. Sir, there are precedents in England, to which the gentleman has alluded, which establish a different principle; and even the one to which he referred only shows that where a duty was proposed to be laid by the British Government, they protected the manufacturer who was under contract for the future delivery of his goods, and placed him in the same position in which I think this law should place every manufacturer who is bound to deliver his manufactured article in future. That is the extent of the precedent to which the gentleman referred.

Sir, I do not admire all the English precedents; but there are some that I do admire. In England they have a precedent for putting down rebellion and a precedent for hanging traitors and rebels. There are some gentlemen in this House and in this country who are opposed to both.

I desire, sir, in presenting my views to this House to appeal to their deliberate and calm judgments. I ask gentlemen if they are willing to establish a precedent which will be dangerous and inconvenient and unwise for the future. It is one that may be applied in principle to every producing interest in the land, and we may have appeals here to extend the principle which we now establish to those other interests.

The district which I represent is a large producer of spirits. Other districts in the State are large consumers. I will not say anything about my own in that respect; but those who produce wish the protection of the Government, so that they may not be injured by unwise and hasty legislation. If, sir, we go on and establish a precedent of this kind, following it up, as we shall have a right to do, in regard to other subjects of production, I say that we shall be pursuing a course of legislation which will be disastrous to all the productive interests of the country. We should hesitate before we do it. I am glad that for some reason or other, I care not what, the Senate has had sufficient spirit and conservatism to strike out this odious and offensive measure in the House bill. I trust we shall concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I have no greater interest in this bill than any other member of the House. My only desire is that we shall pass a bill which will be for the permanent benefit of the Treasury. I can hardly pretend to equal the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] in his solicitude to organize a revenue measure that shall come up to the emergencies of the Government. But it is somewhat remarkable that that gentleman, feeling this solicitude, and having a pride in the action of the House in regard to this bill, should have been found voting in the negative when the bill was on its final passage in the House.

Now, sir, in regard to the statement that there are some gentlemen in the city of New York who may have large quantities of spirits on hand, I do not doubt that there are many men in New York who deserve to be fined, as this bill will fine them if it should pass in the form as first presented to the House by the gentleman from New York; but I am not in favor of even fining these gentlemen without a fair trial and conviction in a court of law. As I think, it would be nothing but a fine imposed upon them as a punishment for having spirits on hand. I am forced to look at the question as a revenue measure, and not a measure of prohibition. I would be as willing as any gentleman of the House to put money in the Treasury, but I conceive it to be of the gravest importance to do it fairly. As I have said on a former occasion, it is utterly and absolutely impracticable to enforce the universal execution of such a law. How are you to begin? And where are you to stop? There is no limit to it. You are to assess this increased tax on all spirits on hand, whether a man has one hundred thousand gallons, one gallon, or a pint. You impose a duty on assessors that they cannot perform. You compel them to hunt through houses, stores, shops, cellars for every drop of spirits that may be on hand; and I say that that will be found utterly impracticable. Under any system of taxation men who are taxed will generally be perfectly satisfied provided that all are taxed alike. We know beforehand, as well as we can know anything future, that at least half the amount on hand would most likely escape taxation. Men would think they had been unhandsonly treated, and they would resort to evasions. Under such a law as this there can be nothing but heart-burnings and opposition throughout the country. I do not wish to excite any clamor about taxation. I desire that our legislation shall be such as will leave the people content to pay the taxes imposed, and content with the general principles upon which they are based. We are compelled at this time to levy very heavy burdens on the people; and I would give no cause of complaint in any quarter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Speaking of heart-burnings, I would ask my friend from Vermont if it would not be the very occasion of heart-burnings and complaints among the people to have to pay their taxes into the hands of speculators instead of for the use of the Government?

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that my bowels of sympathy do not yearn particularly for the consumers of whisky. I am willing that they shall be taxed as much as can be properly got out of them. But the consumer will not pay anything more than he pays now. The retail price, by the glass, is now as high as it can be got.

Mr. GRINNELL. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What does the gentleman pay for his whisky straight?

Mr. MORRILL. The gentlemen are putting questions to me upon a matter about which I have no personal knowledge, except as I am informed by gentlemen near me, and by gentlemen who have appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means. I understand that the price per glass to the gentlemen cannot be increased over its present rate.

There are provisions in the bill which I would wish were somewhat otherwise. For instance, I would be in favor of having the tax go into operation earlier than the date of the passage of the bill. But, as a whole, I deem it more wise for us to accept the bill in its present form, in order that it may become a law as speedily as possible. There are provisions in the Senate amendments which I think are better than those of the House bill, for this reason, that the Senate amendments, taxing whisky sixty cents a gallon from now till the 1st of July, and after the 1st of July increasing it to seventy cents a gallon, and then to eighty cents on the 1st of January, will enable the distiller to go on and keep his distillery in operation, which he could not do if it were not for the prospective increase of the tax.

Let me say one word in regard to the injustice of this to the holders of spirits. It is known to most who have investigated the subject that for a considerable time past the price of spirits has been so high as that it is utterly impossible that any can be exported. There is to be no drawback hereafter, and only those spirits could be exported that have been placed in warehouse for that purpose. Therefore these parties who have it on hand at any price must pay the tax. It must be consumed in this country, and they must keep it until it can be consumed or at once set their houses in order for bankruptcy. Under the circumstances it would be a positive loss to the Government, and result, I believe, in general disaster and ruin to many of the most worthy merchants throughout the land. I should look for more bankruptcies in the large cities of the country than have occurred at any period within the last five years if this bill should become a law as it passed the House.

There are other provisions besides those, of a kindred nature, which led me to vote against the bill when it passed the House. One is the provision for retaining all foreign liquors which have been imported, levying an additional duty of forty cents a gallon—a proceeding entirely new to this or any other country. Having once accorded privileges to the importer, we go back and extort a new price. Where is our mercantile honor? There is no provision in relation to domestic or foreign liquors where a contract has been made to save parties from ruin.

There is another portion of this bill of a kindred character, namely, the tax on cotton a second time. Now the Government itself has sold large quantities of cotton and received pay for it. Shall the Government go back and tax that same cotton a cent or a cent and a half a pound? I conceive that no ranker injustice can be committed. The Government becomes a dangerous party to have any business transactions with.

But, Mr. Speaker, in addition: the bill we have received from the Senate will put into the Treasury a larger sum the first year of its operation and ever after than that passed by the House; and I trust that the House will feel a just pride, if they have once followed the lead of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD], by now backing out.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to restate the arguments which I submitted to the House in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in favor of the general principle that has proved acceptable to the House. The gentleman from New York in opening on that side has so fully repeated those facts and arguments that it is unnecessary for me to go over them. What I desire at this time is to say, first, that again I have the misfortune to dissent from the action of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. I have been unable up to this time to discover the proper ground for the charge of injustice against those who assert the propriety of taxing the stock on hand.

I desire also to say, sir, that I agree to several of the propositions of the Senate. They have added some good features to the bill of the House. I was not contented with the shape in which it was put by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD], at the time his proviso was offered, nor with the subsequent action of the committee in carrying out the principle; not dissatisfied with the principle adopted by the House, but dissatisfied with the form in which it was proposed to apply it, with the details. But I was willing to adopt all then for the sake of the principle.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KASSON. With pleasure.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa what has become of the amendment which I had the honor to offer to him for the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means? I proposed in that amendment an accommodation between the House and the Senate, levying a tax of twenty cents upon the stock on hand, and a tax of forty cents upon the manufactured article in the future. I think that such a proposition will be finally agreed upon, or at least something of that nature. I would like, if consistent with the gentleman's remarks, to have the amendment read to the House and a vote taken upon it, in order that we may know what is the precise position of the House at this time. I am not opposed to putting a tax upon this article of whisky. I believe that the bill of the Senate taxes it too largely, some three or four times the value of the article. I do not believe that any such tax will raise as much revenue as a lighter tax; and therefore I think that the amendment which I gave to the gentleman will meet with the concurrence of a committee of conference if not of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I will read that proposed amendment, if the gentleman desires, presently, when I reach in my remarks what relates to that subject. I first wish to say what, in my opinion, should be the principle of our legislation upon this subject. It will be agreed, I think, on all sides of the House, that our legislation should bear distinct relation to the condition of facts in the country touching the subject in reference to which we propose legislating. What are those facts? They are, first, that by our former act of legislation we authorized the production of distilled spirits upon the payment of a license fee, and charged with the payment upon every gallon produced of a tax of twenty cents. Upon those conditions everybody might introduce any amount of distilled spirits into the market. Further than that our former legislation did not go. It simply authorized the production of this property and putting it forth for sale. But will it be contended, on any sound principle of legislation, that after you have authorized the production of property you never have again the right to touch it with a particle of taxation? Will it be contended that you have created an exclusive class of capitalists in this country who may invest their money in a certain species of property which shall never be liable to be taxed except the first time, and that time, perhaps, before they acquired it? I am opposed to any theory which takes from Congress the right of annual taxation in order to raise revenue. You tax gold and silver plate every year; and you also tax every year land which is tilled for the purpose of sustaining human life, as well as for pecuniary profit. And am I to be told that you cannot tax once a year the investment in the article of whisky because you have once taxed a man for the right of producing it? When the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] therefore says Congress is under a pledge to tax whisky on hand only the original twenty cents, and never to tax it again, I deny the pledge. I say that Congress gave no pledge to the country at that time except the simple pledge that the distiller might under that law produce all the distilled spirits in his power upon the condition of paying a license fee, and twenty cents per gallon when he sent it out for sale.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa why the bill does not impose a taxation equally upon all articles produced in the country; or, in other words, why he makes a distinction between this article and other articles which are produced all through the land? Why does he not impose a proportional tax upon those who produce articles for wearing or eating, or for any other purpose?

Mr. KASSON. The answer seems to me very patent to a question of that kind. It is this: that there are certain articles liable to taxation which will bear a very high rate of taxation in consequence of the demand which exists for them, and as articles of luxury. There are certain other articles for which there is but a slight demand, and which would be taxed out of existence by a high rate of taxation. To the former class of articles—luxuries—most of the discussion now before the House relates. This is an article which bears in England a tax per gallon of $2.42 to-day, and has borne that tax for years, with an increasing production and increasing revenue to the English Government.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the gentleman that the principle which he endeavored to illustrate by reference to the fact that we tax plate every year does not apply to this article at all. We tax carriages and plate for their use every year, but not as a manufacture. We have a very small tax upon coal. Now, I desire to know if the gentleman is prepared—knowing as he does that coal speculators have made almost as much money as whisky speculators—to place a higher and much larger tax upon the coal on hand in this country?

Mr. KASSON. Whenever the coal bill comes before the House I will state what principle, in my judgment, should control our legislation upon that subject. And I will state further, that whenever the people demand coal as an article of luxury merely, instead of treating it as an article of necessity, I will apply the same principle to it that I propose to apply to this article. For the present I proceed, and ask what are the further facts in the country to which our legislation should apply in respect to this subject. We find that under the stimulus of the act of 1862, knowing that the article would bear a higher rate of tax, and that the demand for it would be incessant, and hoping that, as in the former case, Congress would exclude from taxation all that had been brought under taxation prior to the taking effect of the act, these distillers ran largely in excess of the public demand; they created an immense stock on hand, which is on hand to-day, and is held, not for the purposes of ordinary trade, but as a pecuniary investment to take the benefit of a rise by way of speculation.

Now I call the attention of the House to the fact that there are two classes of distillers. One class sell what they produce as they produce it, and have not capital sufficient to retain their production on hand until they choose to put it in market. There is another class of distillers who produce large amounts upon a very large capital and who retain under their control nearly every barrel of their late production. These two interests conflict. I have seen a letter from a distiller in Illinois, which is in the possession of one of our associates in this House, in which the distiller says that if the House policy be adopted it will cost him $30,000 to pay the tax, and yet the tax ought to be imposed. And why? He goes on to say that the distilling interests with which he is connected are such that they cannot afford to have their distilleries stopped, but that other distillers have such immense stocks on hand that they have saved up to take the benefit of the rise that they could afford to have their distilleries destroyed. The purport of it was that they might burn them and yet retire with vast fortunes in their possession realized from the advance upon their accumulated stock.

Now, do not let us forget that we are legislating for these different interests, and also for that other interest, which is pure speculation, where a man has bought of the distiller at a low price, and is holding on for a high price. And I will admit further that some of the stock now on hand is held by men who have bought it at an advanced price, and would consequently, unless the prices should go still higher, lose by the operation.

Now, sir, having reviewed, as I think, sufficiently the condition of the whisky question as to facts and the interests to be affected by legislation, I ask gentlemen to inquire what legislation we should apply to the subject. I say, first, that we ought not to exclude this vast stock on hand, to which our legislation actually adds the price of from forty to sixty cents per gallon, from its fair share in the burdens of the Government, when we give it such benefits.

But I am asked, will you do a hardship to that class who have bought at high prices? I answer in reply to that that they have simply put their property there, taking the chances of legislation, and others will merely be more fortunate than they are, as is the case in all pecuniary races in human life.

In legislation we cannot legislate for each individual case. It is impossible to do that. You do not do it with respect to other taxes which you impose. You simply apply a just principle of legislation and let the consequences fall then as the rain falls, alike upon the farmer who has his harvest in his barns and the farmer whose harvest lies ungathered in his fields.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa to explain to me the difference between speculators in whisky and speculators in cotton or in any other article they choose to speculate in? The whole tenor of the argument to-day seems to be against speculation. If a man engages in a speculation in cotton and invests $1,000,000 in cotton, why do you not tax him in the same proportion that you tax the man who speculates and invests $1,000,000 in liquors? I do not propose to discuss this as a moral question, but merely as a revenue question; and in that view I make the inquiry.

Mr. KASSON. I answer the gentleman that I will follow where the principles of justice lead me touching any article in which investments of money are made. And I say further, that if any citizen of the country seeks to avoid his fair share of the responsibility of all citizens to contribute to the support of the Government in the annual payment of taxes, by investing all his property in a particular article, so as to have the benefit of an anticipated rise to be created by the necessary increase of taxation, I would follow that investment annually to the extent of the power of Congress in the premises—just as much in regard to cotton as in regard to whisky, though not in amount, yet in principle. If the tax on cotton be increased from a half cent to two cents a pound, and if it be found that, in advance of the ordinary operations of commerce, and with reasonable notice, it is held for sale as an article of speculation and for the purpose of taking it out of the range of taxation, I would follow it and make it pay the tax wherever I could find it. Shall we allow investments in any particular article, and say that if a man puts his money in that he must never be reached by taxation? On the contrary, I say that we must give no such temptation to invest in any particular class of property to avoid taxation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken at greater length than I intended on the general principles of the bill. I wish to return to the bill and to say that I like those Senate amendments which propose a sliding scale for an increase of taxation; and I am willing to adopt that principle. What would be the effect of it? If you put twenty cents a gallon on the stock on hand, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, or thirty cents or forty cents, as proposed originally by the House, and then if you have a sliding scale, it ceases to be a question of ultimate loss to the holder of the whisky, and only a question as to the possible loss of interest on the capital that he has invested in it. For instance, a man has one hundred thousand barrels of whisky; you tax him twenty cents a gallon on it, and he has paid ninety cents a gallon for it. That makes the price to him $1.10. If you impose a sliding scale, and he is able to hold on to it until your taxes raise the price of all whisky to $1.10, he can then sell without loss; and it becomes merely a question of interest, and of holding it for a few months longer. In that point of view I have called the attention of some members of the House to the propriety of our changing partially the sliding scale adopted by the Senate; that we retain it as they provide it up to the 1st of July, and then, either on the 1st of October or the 1st of January, raise it if necessary to one dollar a gallon in lieu of eighty cents, so that the public and the distillers may know in advance what tax we are likely to assess on spirits next year.

I differ entirely with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] as to the proposed tax being excessive. I doubt if he can point to any country in the world which has anything like a large internal revenue, where whisky is taxed as low as we tax it or even as low as one dollar a gallon. But this proposition of a sliding scale will save every capitalist who has money invested in whisky if he will continue to hold it for a few months longer. The stock on hand, as represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], is two hundred thousand barrels. Be it more or less, it makes a stock of four or eight months' consumption on hand before dealers are compelled to buy the new stock from distillers. As soon as that stock is exhausted the cost of the article comes up to the figure which the holder of accumulated stock requires to save him from loss. That will be the effect of a well-adjusted amendment of this sort. For that reason I am in favor of the sliding scale, alike for the benefit of distillers and for the benefit of holders of accumulated stock. I am also persistently in favor of a reasonable tax, of twenty or thirty cents, on the stock on hand, to enable distillers to go on against the otherwise intolerable competition that they would experience from the holders of the stock on hand. It is not merely that the distillers have got on hand stocks of grain to distill, they have also large amounts of money invested in the cattle that they feed, in the hogs that they feed, in the fuel that they use in carrying on their operations.

Since I have last spoken on this subject in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I have had representations from distillers for the first time sustaining these arguments, and showing as clearly to my mind as anything ever has been demonstrated to me that the taxation of the whisky on hand is for their business practically a necessity. They cannot turn their cattle off now, nor can they turn away the hogs they are feeding. They cannot afford to shut up their distilleries, for they tell me that to shut up the distilleries for six months is almost equivalent to their destruction; that they must have some protection, if this increased rate upon the article to be manufactured is determined upon, to enable them to run. One of them tells me that he thinks twenty cents per gallon on the stock on hand will enable the smaller distilleries, of which I spoke in the beginning of my remarks, to continue to run, if the House is not disposed to make a higher rate.

For these reasons I do not ask that the House shall now go into a careful examination of the bill in all its details; but I ask that they shall take such order upon the most important feature of the bill as shall indicate their determination in regard to taxing stocks on hand. If the vote is to non-concur, I hope the whole bill may go to a committee of conference; and I state from information which is before me, and which comes to me as it comes to other members of the House, that the Senate will be disposed to support in part the proposition of the House, as the House will be disposed to support in part the position of the Senate.

For these reasons, I repeat my hope that when the question is put it will be put in such form as shall test the opinion of the House upon concurring or non-concurring in the leading proposition of the bill, which is, as every gentleman knows, that relating to the imposition of an additional tax upon the stock of whisky on hand. If it were proper I would move to amend the motion of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means so as to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference, for the purpose, as I have suggested, of revising the whole bill and making all its measures harmonize each with the other; it being understood that a vote to non-concur is a vote to adhere to the action of the House in imposing an additional tax upon the stock on hand. If the vote is to concur, the result will speak for itself.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not intend to discuss the provisions of this bill; the State from which I come has for the present but very little interest in it, and I am willing to let those who are interested in it decide to a great extent the features of the bill. I rise, however, to say that I am opposed to an increased tax upon the whisky on hand in the United States; but, sir, there are other provisions in the bill as it comes from the Senate which I desire to see modified, and rather than lose the opportunity of obtaining some modification I shall feel constrained to support the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, and vote to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that I introduced a motion which is now before the House to non-concur and ask a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the first question will be upon the amendments of the Senate; that motion takes precedence of a motion to non-concur.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, sir, I desire to call the attention of the House to the motion I have made.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not yielded the floor. The gentleman from Illinois is speaking without authority. I call him to order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no doubt the gentleman from Kentucky would yield to me if I asked him.

Mr. MALLORY. If you ask me, I will yield to you.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend is always so polite I know he would grant anything.

Mr. MALLORY. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have already said all I intended to. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman, and beg his pardon. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. So that if it is in order I would move that the House concur in certain amendments with modifications, and non-concur in others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is familiar with the rules, and knows that a vote can be taken upon concurring in the Senate amendments as a whole only by unanimous consent. The gentleman has the right to have a vote upon concurring in any separate amendment of the Senate, and when the House has reached the amendment to which he refers, it will be in order if the previous question shall not have been called to move to concur with an amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not expect to be able to make the motion in order, and I have therefore taken this opportunity to say that I am in favor of modifying the bill of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be in order if the previous question shall not have been called when the House reaches the amendment the gentleman desires to amend.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire, if I can do so, to so amend the amendment imposing an increased tax upon whisky as that there shall be no increased tax upon whisky to be manufactured from and after the passage of this bill until the 1st of January next, and that then the tax shall be seventy cents per gallon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the first amendment of the Senate is now the only one before the House.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not ask the permission of the House. I presume that the House will not give it; and I am not in the habit of asking unanimous consent for anything. I would be glad to see the provision adopted. I would like to give the large distillers time to sell their swill. I would like to give them time to dispose of the large material which they laid in under the provisions of the law. I do not think that they could do it in a shorter time. I do not believe any such amendment as this will be passed, and I do not believe when the opportunity occurs that I shall move it.

Mr. Speaker, I have no great interest in this matter as a Representative from Kentucky, because under the orders of the military authority we are prohibited in that State from making whisky. I do not know how soon it will be before we will be prohibited from drinking it. [Laughter.]

I wish to state before taking my seat, that in the Journal I am recorded in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] when he originally offered it. I wish to state that I voted against that amendment, and that when it was carried I voted against the bill because that amendment was in it. That was my position. In the Globe I was made to favor the amendment of the gentleman from New York, when I voted against it, and I ask that the record shall be corrected.

A MEMBER. It is in the Journal in the same way.

Mr. MALLORY. If that be so, I hope that I will be permitted to make a motion correcting the Journal in that respect. I was not here the next day on the reading of the Journal, and I did not pay attention when the yeas and nays were called over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded as voting for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MALLORY. I voted against that amendment, and I ask that the Journal be corrected.

There was no objection, and the Journal was corrected accordingly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire, Mr. Speaker, briefly to give to the House some views which have occurred to my mind in connection with this important question. Having looked somewhat into the principle adopted by the former action of the House on this subject, I conceive it to be one of the most pernicious principles of legislation that has ever been thrust upon the country. Aside from the question of what this article is that is sought to be taxed, I desire to be heard for a few moments on the principle embraced in this motion. For whatever principle may be applied to the article of whisky may be applied as well to the article of manufactured cotton, or woolen, or any other commodity of trade. If that is the issue, if this Congress is ready to do that, to make the man who has manufactured spirituous liquors under the promise that he shall pay a tax of twenty cents, pay forty cents in addition thereto, then let it be so. We have the same right, and, I trust, some day the power, to increase the tax upon manufactured cotton and woolen goods, after paying three per cent. for the privilege of manufacturing. Who would for one moment conceive that under the present revenue system, which taxes eastern manufactures three per cent.; we have the right, after they have produced the goods and thrust them upon the market, to tax them ten per cent. more?

Sir, I will call the attention of the House to the fact that never in the history of this country, or any other enlightened and civilized country, was such a principle of revenue declared.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it has not been the practice to tax articles grown or produced in the raw state, and subsequently, and after it has entered into articles of manufacture, to tax it again? Has not that been the fact under the practice of this Government?

Mr. VOORHEES. No, sir; no such principle has ever been asserted; and if such a thing has ever been done at all it has been only as an incident to taxation. I here assert that neither England nor America has ever laid down the principle of inducing the manufacture of an article by a certain amount of license to be paid, and after the manufactured article was produced of laying an additional tax on it for the privilege of selling. It is an unjust, an unfair, and a fraudulent practice upon a man who has been induced to invest his means, to hire the services of laborers, to give his energy, money, and time to the production of this article and then retax it, as we propose to here.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. One more question.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I wish to know whether the law, as it now exists, does not lay a tax of twenty cents upon the distillation; and whether the law now proposed has not this distinction, that it proposes to lay a tax of sixty cents upon the article on hand for sale?

Mr. VOORHEES. If the gentleman from New York will tell me what the article of whisky is distilled for except for sale, I will see the pertinency of his question. The twenty cents imposed upon the article for the purpose of allowing it to be distilled is for the very purpose of allowing it to be sold. And the forty cents additional you propose is for the same purpose—for the privilege of selling.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the tax now proposed is not for the past production, nor is it collected at the time of the production. It is a tax to be collected after it is sold, or removed for consumption or sale. We propose to increase the tax on the current products of the distiller, as such, only after the law goes into effect, not retroactively.

I repeat, the fact to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the gentleman is, that the debate now turns upon taxing whisky on hand for sale. Nothing additional is charged now in the nature of a license for the past production of the distillery. The point we aim our arguments at is that the very producing interest in behalf of which the gentleman speaks demands this kind of legislation; and I beg leave to read a half dozen lines from a gentleman, a dealer in Boston. He says:

"I have noticed the amendments the Senate have made to the liquor tax as passed by the House of Representatives, and being well posted in these matters, I thought I would give you my views on the subject, (for what they are worth,) which are, that unless the liquor on hand held by distillers and speculators, chiefly by the latter, is taxed, the Government will get but a very small sum from the New England States for two years to come. The quantity held is immense, and is increasing daily. I have held conversation with two of our distillers, who have not the means to hold on, who concur in my views on the subject entirely."

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Iowa for furnishing the views of his friend from Boston, and as his friend from Boston. remarks that he tenders them for what they are worth, I accept them in that light; and inasmuch as I think them worth very little, I will proceed to answer a question of more importance, propounded by the gentleman from Iowa himself; and that is the question attempted to be raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] and followed up by the gentleman from Iowa, that there is a distinction between licensing a distillery and laying a tax upon the right of sale. Now I understand that twenty cents was in the first place laid upon this article, in order, when paid, to confer the privilege of manufacturing and selling the article. The amendment of the gentleman from New York follows the very language of the original bill in conferring the same privilege by payment of this additional tax. In other words, twenty cents is paid in the first place for the right of distilling and taking the products into the market and disposing of them for money. So the original bill expresses itself.

The amendment of the gentleman from New York imposes this additional tax of forty cents for the same privilege, expressed in the same words. I oppose this whole thing upon principle. If you have a right to go back and touch a man's vested rights upon one article of trade you have a right to do it upon all; and I reiterate the statement which I have already made, that no enlightened country has ever done so. This country has never done it before, if it shall do it now. England has never done it; and our Constitution, in my judgment, expressly forbids it.

Mr. KASSON. I ask pardon of the gentleman for requesting again to make a statement to him in respect to England.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. KASSON. I stated when this subject was before the Committee of the Whole, with the English statute before me, from which I read—I do not know whether the gentleman was present on that occasion—that a law of the English Parliament passed on the 30th of August imposed a rate retroactively, taking effect in the month of March, I think, and another still higher rate taking effect in the month of July upon the former products, with express provisions to provide for sales made on time by compelling the purchaser to pay the increased tax or duty.

I make this statement to correct what I think is an error of observation on the part of the gentleman touching the practice of the English Government on this subject.

I wish to say further, if the gentleman will permit me, that the proposition now before the House is not to tax the distiller more than twenty cents per gallon for the running of his distillery heretofore on products which have been sold or may be sold to-day, but to tax the products of the distillery after this act goes into effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, to ask the gentleman from Iowa one question.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose a distiller has not sold his product, but has paid his tax on it from month to month, and has a hundred or a thousand barrels on hand; do I understand the gentleman to say that the bill as it passed the House would not tax that quantity the additional forty cents per gallon?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir. The stock accumulated in the distillery will be reached, not as the product of the distillery to meet current demands of trade, but as a stock of merchandise on hand, an investment of money. The ground I take is distinctly that capitalists ought not to be permitted to make any investments of money which will be beyond the reach of annual taxation, if the necessity of the Government requires increased rates of taxation, whether in whisky or in other articles of trade.

Mr. STEVENS. That is to say, the distiller must sell all his whisky while it is green. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. He will be green if he does not. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to present this matter to the House in the order in which it presents itself to my mind. As to the question of fact raised between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I may touch on that presently. But upon the historical question pending between the gentleman from Iowa and myself, I understand it to be as I stated. I understand it to be so from my own observation and from a very high authority with me—the statement of the careful and learned chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] I have noticed his statement upon this point, and it is that no country claiming an enlightened jurisprudence has ever resorted to this mode of taxation.

But, Mr. Speaker, if all the nations of the earth had sanctioned it, it would not be relieved of its inherent injustice; and the framers of our Constitution, taking that view of the question, I think have met all such laws as this by an express negative. It may not occur so to other gentlemen, but it occurs to me that this is plainly an ex post facto law. It is true that an ex post facto law properly applies to a criminal proceeding, but the principle obtains in every affair of life and in relation to every vested right. If this is not such a law in principle, pray tell me what an ex post facto law is. An ex post facto law, by the very terms used to signify such a law, is a measure of legislation reaching backward and touching vested rights. Whenever any man or any class of the community has obtained vested rights under the law, any law thereafter impairing those rights, nullifying them, abrogating them, is to all intents and purposes, in spirit and in practice, an ex post facto law. Look at it in that light. Have these men got vested rights in this property? Have they obtained them by paying to the Government the contract price agreed upon for the carrying on of their business?

The plain fact comes back to a legal mind that these men have paid the price of the privilege which they enjoyed, that of making whisky and selling it. The price of the privilege was to be twenty cents a gallon. That they have paid; and you now come to them and tell them that before they can enjoy this privilege which they were told by the former law they could have, they must respond to the extortionate demand made upon them by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

It is a question that rises up between citizen and his Government. If this Government is to set an example of broken faith, disregarding its own bounden obligations, it will go far to loosen the bonds of allegiance which an honest people now recognize to their Government. When they find that that Government does not keep its own allegiance to them they will no longer feel their own binding upon them. Governments and citizens have reciprocal duties. The citizen owes the Government a duty. The Government owes the citizen a duty; and when one fails, the other has a right to fail. Society is a contract. Government is a contract. The consideration of allegiance and duty on the part of the citizen is the protection and good faith of the Government.

But, sir, I do not stand on that question without authority. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in an exactly analogous case, that such legislation as that in which we are now engaged is unconstitutional. In a case in the Supreme Court, coming up from the State of Maryland, a question was decided embracing this point. The Government had laid an impost duty on foreign goods. Foreign goods were landed at the port of Baltimore, and the impost duty was paid upon them. The State of Maryland undertook to charge something for a license to sell the goods within its borders. Is not that exactly parallel to this? Here is a right obtained at the customhouse in the first instance, and then another legislation comes in and says that it will charge an additional license for doing that which the law authorized the man to do on paying the first rate of duty. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that the right in the importer was a vested right, and that the subsequent legislation attempted was in the nature of an ex post facto law, disturbing vested rights.

Sir, I say to this House, this whole legislation is null. It will not stand for a moment before any intelligent judicial tribunal. The light which the Constitution sheds on the rights of a citizen under his Government is conclusive to any legal mind.

But now, Mr. Speaker, let me touch on some points raised by the gentleman from Iowa. How will this law work on this interest? That is the question which he tenders. Aside from the abstract legal right how will it work? I assert, sir, that in principle it is wrong; and I stand here to prove that in practice it is inexpedient, impolitic, and unjust. First let me call the attention of the House to the main question. You want money. You want revenue. You want the sinews of war. How much do you suppose you are going to get by breaking the faith of the Government with the citizen?

One would suppose by the clamorous zeal which the advocates of this measure evince on this floor that you were going to get out of this tax enough to close up the war, to pay the public debt, and to indemnify the people of the country for the losses which they have sustained. What is the fact? Why, sir, the census of 1860 shows that in the States now loyal to this Government some eighty million gallons of spirituous liquors were distilled. On that basis you have some twenty million gallons distilled in any period of ninety days since that time; and it is a liberal estimate, derived from experience, that perhaps one half of that quantity is now on hand.

A word here upon this point. It seems that everybody who holds a stock of liquors on hand is a speculator. Why, sir, I say to the House that ex necessitate, from the very force of our circumstances, especially in the West, the distiller must be caught with a large stock on hand. For instance, in the spell of cold weather that occurred a short time since, transportation was almost entirely suspended in the West, and the distiller, who was manufacturing liquors, could not get them to market, and perforce they have remained on his hands; and because of this misfortune you have caught him, and by this law you propose to rob him.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If the gentleman will permit me I desire, on this question of the quantity on hand in the East to be affected by this provision, to read a single item from the list of prices current in New York, from which it appears that there arrived in the city of New York during the months of September, October, November, and December, two million seven hundred and ninety three thousand eight hundred and seventy gallons of whisky.

Mr. VOORHEES. What of that? Suppose you take the quantity at ten million gallons—half the amount I have estimated as the whole product of the manufacture in the country for ninety days—how much do you suppose your proposed tax would pour into the exhausted Treasury of the nation? Well, it will yield $4,000,000, and that will carry on this Government about thirty-eight hours.

But you do not put all that into the hands of the Government. You increase the large swarm of officers by which revenue is collected, and the most odious class of officers to the American people are the excisemen. You are to increase and swell up the number of excisemen for the collection of this unjust tax, a tax that will not be willingly paid. The humblest mind in the nation knows that it is an unjust law and will resist it. The humblest mind in the land knows that the Constitution confers no privilege upon the Government to take from him his rights. You will have an angry contest then in getting this money; you will have to meet the most expensive litigation; you will have to pay this swarm of officers, and you will not get into the Treasury out of this tax which you propose to levy more than $2,000,000. And that would not run this Government one day; it did not a year ago, as I proved, I believe, to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in a contest between us on this floor in regard to the Government expenses at that time.

Therefore, for the sake of a mere one day's expenses of the Government, you will spread dismay and disaffection, if it does not result in bloodshed, throughout the country by this violation of the Constitution of the country and of the faith of the Government. That is what you will do if you persist in this proposed legislation. Are you ready to sanction it?

Remember, too, another thing. This is but once. You will have killed the goose that laid the golden egg; you cannot catch these men again; you grab $2,000,000 this time, but there is an end of it.

But who do you affect by this legislation? There are three, perhaps four, classes who will be affected by this species of legislation. First, the distiller; second, the speculator; third, the retailer; and fourth, the consumer. And I here aver that nine out of every ten gallons of liquor which will be affected by this tax are in the hands of the distiller. But suppose it were not so, who so mean as to be envious of another man's prosperity? I speak with entire respect for the opinions of those who are opposed to me when I say that the effect of this legislation is to strike down men who have engaged in a legitimate business transaction. Sir, do not ask me to be a party to any such operation—not certainly for so small a pittance as the Government will realize from this scheme.

If a man has invested his money in whisky with the view that it may rise in price, he has done no more than is done in every other article in every branch of trade, no more than as an honest man he had a right to do; and, having a right to do so, in my judgment I would not be an honest man if I were to interfere with him. Where is our right to do it because some man is going to make a little money? Suppose some man is going to speculate, what is it your business? Where is your right to step between him and his legitimate trade? Conceding that every gallon of this liquor was in the hands of speculators, in the hands of those who bought it to sell at a profit, that would no more shake the principle which prevails in my mind than it would change absolute right into absolute wrong.

And, Mr. Speaker, is this House prepared to send excise officers all over the land to the retailers, to the man who has bought in his legitimate business? And when I say legitimate, I mean lawful. I stop not to make temperance speeches here. I stop not to discuss and split hairs with my friend from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] or anybody else on the morality of this question. I try it as any other question of business and property is tried. I shall take the instance of the humble retailer who has bought his barrel and is retailing it at the corner of some street in some town of the West or the East. He has paid his twenty cents for the right to sell. Would you like to be the exciseman sent to tell that retailer that he has to pay forty cents in addition to the twenty? There is not a man in this wide land but will cry shame in your face at this injustice. There is where the retailers stand.

Mr. Speaker, I have laid before the House the views which will govern my vote on this subject. I shall vote to concur in the Senate amendment. I have voted against this bill. I have to vote for it as a choice now; and in voting to concur in the Senate amendments shall vote between the original bill of this House and the shape in which it comes now. There can be no doubt in my mind as to the propriety of that course on the part of the opponents of the measure.

I look upon this as a matter of grave importance. It is the assertion of an obnoxious and unjust principle. You cannot come to a compromise on this subject. You cannot compromise away vested rights. If you tell the citizen that he has no protection against this sort of taxation, you have done him all the harm that you can do him. The man who stands upon principle would pay sixty as soon as twenty cents, for if you can lay twenty the exigencies of the revenue will call upon you on some other occasion to levy forty cents or one dollar. If it is right to lay twenty, it is right to lay forty for the revenue of the country. If it is right to touch it at all, it is right to go further and to get all you can. It is wrong in toto. It is the assertion of a subversive principle to the private rights of citizens of this or any other country.

I have submitted, briefly as I could, the views I hold on this subject. I regret to differ from some of my friends on this side of the House, but looking on this as an evil I have felt constrained to say what I have.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has not the Senate raised the tax upon the production of spirits to eighty cents per gallon; and I ask the gentleman whether he does not think that that is an injustice?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think that that is right. My vote stands recorded against it. I have voted against that provision because of its injustice. I have not stopped to argue the injustice of this legislation to the Northwest alone, from which I come. I have not thought it worth while. There is much I could add, much I have felt, but I have contented myself with showing my disapprobation of that bill, and especially those exorbitant features adopted by a former vote of this House. I have the choice between the original bill, which I look upon as less obnoxious, and the bill as amended by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. One further question.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to know if my friend from Indiana is not now, in his argument, discriminating against the Northwest and in favor of the speculator who holds whisky?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think so, or I would not make the argument. This certainly is a very superfluous suggestion. My love for the Northwest is too well known to subject me to a question of that kind. I may be mistaken in what I am doing, but as to my motive there can be no doubt.

Mr. GRINNELL. When this matter was discussed originally upon the introduction of the bill, I had the honor to move an amendment proposing an additional tax of $1 20 a gallon. I have not retracted from the position I then took; and I have, on reflection, been confirmed in my opinion that that was a proper rate of taxation also by numerous letters, I may say scores if not hundreds I have received, approving of my course upon the subject. I believe it is the duty of this House to adhere to its bill, and not accept the amendments proposed by the Senate. Why? I am not going to discuss the morality or immorality of this traffic. I did make some allusions on a previous occasion to the whisky business which distressed gentlemen upon the other side of the House; but I do not propose now to call in question their party, their "nurseries," or their principles. I would discuss this as a business question solely; yet I wish to make this remark, that I hold it to be a dereliction of duty on the part of Congress not to discourage a vicious habit—I may say an expensive habit—by making vice more expensive, and that will, to some degree, guide my legislation upon this question: holding, if I can make a habit known to be a vicious habit an expensive habit, I shall discourage it thereby.

I wish to say a word now in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. VOORHEES.] He has here, with great apparent feeling, uttered remarks in regard to the bankruptcy of a certain class in this country. Does the gentleman suppose that those who have gone into these speculations in whisky, and invested hundreds of thousands, have put their all into this business? The gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who offered the amendment which is the principal cause of division, has answered the question. He knows personally gentlemen in the city of New York who have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in whisky on speculation. Where do these and other gentlemen live? On Fifth avenue; not in Indiana or Iowa—in country places. They are the millionaires of this country and the bankers of the country; and the gentleman wishes those men who have made their millions out of the country to make their millions more out of these whisky speculations at the expense of the poorer patriotic class of taxpayers. I have no fears in regard to the rich stock-jobbers. When, perhaps, they have lost a little in money in speculation, they will have enough left, and let us turn our thoughts and sympathies in another direction; they do not need them.

The gentleman inquires what they will say who are now retailing whisky in this country; the men who are dealing it out by the glass disturb the gentleman. They will say it is a small practical joke, and will not regard this action as anything serious. What, I ask, does the man make who retails a gallon of whisky? I am told by those who are familiar with this matter that whisky is retailed at ten cents a glass. Never having bought a glass in my life I do not know what the charge is, but I am told that is the latest price. Well, then, he who retails it makes some five or six dollars a gallon, except his customers take wholesale drinks. And yet the gentleman from Indiana almost sheds tears over the hardship imposed upon such men, and comes here to intercede for the retailer because we propose to lay a tax of forty cents upon his gallon of whisky out of which he makes five or six dollars. My sympathies and ideas of justice do not flow in that channel. I would rather restrict than extend that business. I would rather go to the man who is dealing out this damnation in small quantities, and say, "I am willing you should stop this business, because you lead in your train litigation, misery, woe, and everything the Government should desire to put away from the country." That is my answer to that position of the gentleman. Our sympathies should go with the people who desire to put money into the Treasury, if we must endure the curse of whisky.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. A single question.

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Iowa is after revenue or after the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GRINNELL. I am after revenue, and also after the whisky-drinking constituents of the gentlemen from New York and Wisconsin. I would like to reach the foe of this country, and the man who retails whisky to the Democrats who support whisky sentiments. [Laughter.] Is the gentleman answered?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Another question. I would like to know whether the gentleman is after the Democrats for the sake of getting a drink or not?

Mr. GRINNELL. After the Democrats in this case only by indirection. I intend to look after them by direction by and by, but not to-day.

Now, sir, this is a practical question of money. As I estimate it, it involves the question of $50,000 to my district alone, a district of one hundred and thirty-four thousand people. It is a question whether this money shall come out of the pockets of the speculators, bankers, millionaires, and the rich of the country, or be drawn from the pockets of the people who live upon their farms. That is the practical question, and I, for one, have no hesitation in deciding it.

If, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] says, the law is unconstitutional, I am willing to leave that matter to the decision of the courts. I believe that he has great respect for the courts of the country—much greater than I have for some of them—and I am willing to leave that question, if there is doubt, where it belongs. But, sir, I happened to be in the Senate when this matter was under discussion, and I heard an honorable Senator, once Attorney General of the United States, remark that, in his opinion, there was no difficulty upon this question, and that there was no constitutional prohibition and no constitutional objection to retaxing whisky. I give that opinion of an ex-Attorney General of the United States in opposition to the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana who has just taken his seat, since I do not propose to be frightened out of my propriety or my vote in this matter by any appeals in regard to the unconstitutionality of the act. Let us pass the law, get the revenue, and if any are wronged they can find redress.

Now, the sum involved is large. It is not less than eight or ten million dollars, as I understand from those who have written to me on the subject, and who ought to know. And perhaps I may as well say here that I have friends who would be injured pecuniarily by the passage of this bill, and good friends too, friends of my boyhood and of my manhood, whom it would be a pleasure to oblige; but can I yield to their appeals, although they say frankly that this is going to injure them, taking money in large amounts out of their pockets? No, sir; there is a higher principle involved; there is a question of revenue and a question of right, of duty, and I cannot yield to any such suggestions.

Sir, the exigency is great. We want this money and we know how we can get it. But the gentleman says that we are going to multiply the swarm of excisemen. Suppose we should add a hundred or even a thousand, what would that be compared with the raising by right and at once of eight or ten million dollars of revenue? It could not cost more than one or two hundred thousand dollars, and what percentage is that on the collection of $10,000,000! No, sir; that objection is not well taken. There is no man who loves his country, no citizen who would see its Treasury filled, who would object to seeing these excisemen appointed to go forth and find who are the men who have invested money for speculative purposes in this whisky which we propose to tax.

But the gentleman says that this legislation is unprecedented. The practice of Great Britain on the subject has been quoted, which proves that we do not want a precedent. If it is unprecedented, I answer the condition of the country is unprecedented; and I reply further that the article which we are proposing to tax is an exception to all of the articles manufactured in this country. It does not stand in the same class even with tobacco and the other luxuries of the country. It is useless as a beverage, it is unnecessary save for mechanical purposes, it is destructive to those who use it, and therefore we have a right to come directly to the article and wherever we can find it impose a penalty upon and raise money from those who use it. If, as the gentleman says, it will not decrease the use of it—and in that I differ from him—then I am acting for revenue as well as indirectly with a view to discourage the use of this article and promote happiness and morality among the millions.

It has been said in this discussion to-day that we are doing injustice to those who hold this liquor on hand and who purchased it for speculation. Grant that they may not make as much money, but where are my constituents engaged in distilling? There is a large amount of whisky manufactured in my district—I wish there were none manufactured or consumed—but what is the condition of those who are engaged in this manufacture? They are not large manufacturers. They sell what they manufacture with little delay. As soon as a few loads are manufactured, they are sent off to St. Louis, Chicago, or New York. What must be their appeal; what their interest? Why, "if you now increase the tax on whisky to be manufactured when corn has risen in price and labor is more expensive and impose more on that now in store and held by speculators, you virtually destroy our business. You put us into the hands of the holders of the stocks for the next year or two, and if you stop our distilling now, it is tantamount to winding up our business. There is no distiller in the land, unless one who is very rich, who can afford to suspend business for a year; it would involve bankruptcy." That is the argument on the other side not to tax. The amendment adopted by the House does justice to those who are engaged in the business, to those who have their capital invested in it, and to all who are willing to pay their share of the tax. It works injustice to none.

The question really resolves into this, whether we are willing to forego the advantage of the increased tax, and give it to the speculators. I say, increase the tax first, and then impose it on all the whisky now on hand and hereafter to be distilled. Let those who have been acting on the presumption that the duty would be increased, who have prepared themselves for the storm, who have anticipated the law, pay their share of the increased tax. I have received letters saying that this increase had been expected, that it has been for months the talk on "Change, in distillers' offices, and all over the land. And therefore it cannot be said that these speculators did not go into the business fully aware of the risk they were incurring.

My position, Mr. Speaker, which I believe cannot be controverted, is that we owe it to the country, we owe it to safe precedents, we owe it to the people, not to exempt from the payment of this tax a few men who are wallowing in wealth and luxury, and who have invested some of their surplus in whisky in anticipation of the increased duty. They will not thank us for leniency but will attribute it to our lack of sagacity. They will look upon us as having basely yielded to clamor outside of this Hall as well as in it, that we have yielded to speculators, to those who care not for the condition of the Treasury, but only for their own pockets. Sir, my course is clear. I shall vote to increase the tax to the eighty cents proposed by the Senate bill and to assess it upon all the stock on hand as only even justice to the holder and producer, and a measure of relief in the sum of millions of dollars to our Treasury.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN obtained the floor but yielded to Mr. Cox for a motion to adjourn.

HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, had taken from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 60) amendatory of the homestead law, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Lands a bill amendatory of the homestead law; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed, and recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVY-YARD AT CAIRO.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a navy-yard, depot, and marine hospital at Cairo, Illinois, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STATES IN REBELLION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the committee on rebellious States, and to have it printed, and postponed until to-morrow two weeks, after the morning hour.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to the postponement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the bill being reported and ordered to be printed, but not to be made a special order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask to have it printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that the views of the minority may also be printed.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that the bill be reported, printed, and postponed, with an opportunity to the minority of the committee to have their views printed. Is there objection?

Mr. BROOKS. I object to the postponement. I do not object to the report of the bill and to its recommittal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BROOKS declined to do so.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I ask that the bill be printed and recommitted.

There being no objection,

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the committee on rebellious States, reported a bill to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed, and recommended to the committee.

WASHINGTON GUARDIAN SOCIETY.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, asked unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a bill granting certain privileges to the Guardian Society of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SENDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senate to give me a moment's indulgence this morning to make a statement in regard to the expenditures of the contingent fund, about which there was some debate and controversy yesterday, and about which some statements were made that might be calculated to do injury to some persons, and to create the impression that the fund was wrongly administered.

I took occasion this morning to go into the Secretary's office and make a pretty full examination of that matter; for I confess I felt a little mortified that a fund under our control and examination should be in that confused condition. I am happy to be able to state that I did not find it so. I did not find that there has been any improper drawing from one fund to another except in one case only; and that was where there was a fund of $52,164 51 to the credit of binding, from which there had been appropriated $20,000 for the payment of the printing of the Globe. Mr. Rives wanted the money a little sooner than the appropriate fund could be used, and it was suggested at the Treasury Department that that fund might be anticipated; but the money is in another fund, and is to be replaced, so that it works no mischief to anybody. That is the only individual case I could find or trace where there has been a transfer of balances or a drawing from one fund to another.

It was also stated by one of the members of the Finance Committee yesterday that bills were brought before the Secretary of the Senate and paid and were afterwards submitted to the Committee on Contingent Expenses for their examination and approval, making it appear almost a farce that the bills were submitted to the committee at all. But such has not been the practice, I am authorized to say, and in no one case that I can find have bills been submitted to the committee for approval except always before they were paid. I can find no instance where it has been done. When the year is through, as an auditing committee, we look over all the bills, and compare the vouchers with the accounts to see that they are properly vouched, and that is probably the reason why the statement was made. I desire to say that I have taken the pains to go and look the bills all over that have been paid out of the miscellaneous fund through the year, and I have not found one that in my judgment is extravagant or improper.

The person drawing did not comply with the requisition of the committee in having the oath put upon the bill as we required; but that was owing to the change of the disbursing clerk in the Secretary's office. Mr. Bowen, who was the disbursing clerk when the committee directed that to be done, went into another office, and the present clerk came in without knowing what had been the requirement of the committee, and so allowed it to go along; but I cannot find any trace or any appearance of any improper conduct on the part of any officer of the Senate.

The deficiency has arisen not so much from anything this year as from what has taken place before. I find that in the year 1862 there was a deficiency in the miscellaneous fund of $19,111 76. Then that, instead of being paid in 1862, as it should have been, went over into the year 1863, and at the end of 1863 there was a deficiency of $14,327 55; so that at the commencement of this fiscal year, on the 1st of July, there was a deficiency in the miscellaneous fund; and so far from what was appropriated, $20,000, this year being deficient, it has paid the expenses so far or nearly so far along, and reduced the deficiency to $10,000, reduced it quite $4,000; and if it had not been for the deficiency of previous years there would have been no deficiency this year.

I make this statement because what was said yesterday might be calculated to do injustice to somebody, and I make it also in justice to the committee, because they have endeavored to see that that fund was appropriated properly. I cannot find any trace of malappropriation of the fund.

Mr. DIXON. When the statement was made yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that it was in evidence before the Committee on Finance that the bills presented to the Committee on Contingent Expenses had already been paid before they were submitted for their consideration, I was very much surprised; but as he made it so confidently I was not prepared at that time to contradict it. I am very glad to hear the statement from the Senator from New Hampshire which he has now made. It is entirely in accordance with what I believe to be the facts in the case. The bills that are paid without being presented to the committee are the bills which are excepted in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio himself. They are certain payments which are provided for by law; for instance, the payment of pages and certain officers of the Senate, where provision is made by law and there is no doubt in regard to the payment. In those cases the payment is made by the Secretary of the Senate, as has always been the case; as was the case when the late Secretary, Mr. Dickinson, was in office. But wherever there is any doubt on any question, the bills, I believe, are always presented for approval to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I will state that at this time there are some before the committee the propriety of which we are considering, and which have not yet been paid.

It was also stated yesterday that it was the habit of the Secretary of the Senate, or the disbursing clerk, to take a portion of one fund and appropriate it to the payment of other expenses. I believe that has not been the case. The Senator from New Hampshire himself, I think, stated that even the fund appropriated for the payment of the compensation and mileage of Senators had been taken for certain contingent expenses. Now, sir, that payment is not made out of the contingent fund. The compensation and mileage of Senators are not paid out of the contingent fund at all; so that in no case would that money be appropriated to the payment of contingent expenses without a great violation of law.

I believe, sir, that the statement which the Senator from New Hampshire has just made is entirely correct. It is in accordance with my own view of the case, and I am very glad that he has made it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire. I therefore do not know whether he called in question my statement of yesterday or not.

Mr. CLARK. I did in one respect, if the Senator from Ohio will hear me. I think the Senator was wrong in the impression that might have been created in regard to the action of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, when he said that the bills were paid first, and then passed to the committee for examination and approval. If that were so, as I stated at the time, it would make it appear somewhat farcical that they should be paid first and then approved. That is not so. Where there is any doubt about the bills they are passed to the committee before they are paid; but where there is no doubt, where they are clearly authorized by law, they are paid first, and on an examination of the accounts at the end of the quarter the vouchers are compared with the accounts; and that probably is what the Senator referred to, though what he said was calculated, perhaps, to give a wrong impression. I can find no trace where a bill by itself has been presented to the committee for their examination and approval after it has been paid, and I have examined very thoroughly in regard to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not in my statement yesterday design to call in question the conduct of the Secretary of the Senate or of any officer of the Senate. I simply wished to state the facts as they appeared before the Committee on Finance; and I will state again, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that to explain this deficiency the paying teller of the Secretary of the Senate was called before the Committee on Finance and he did expressly say on examination that he paid the accounts before they were examined by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and that he paid them after the appropriation was exhausted. He furnished us a written statement to show that when he came into office there was a deficiency in the contingent appropriation of nine thousand and some hundred dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He mentioned Mr. Rives's account. That was not examined by the committee at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. He showed that when he came into office the contingent fund had been overdrawn by some nine thousand and odd hundred dollars, and was now overdrawn over ten thousand dollars. He said he had increased the deficiency a little. We asked him then the distinct question, "Out of what money did you pay this sum? How could you pay money after the appropriation was exhausted?" He at once replied that it was paid out of other appropriations that were used temporarily for the purpose until the deficiency was made up by subsequent appropriation. Upon inquiry whether this was the practice, he stated that it was the practice not only of his predecessor, but had been the practice for years; that he had examined and informed himself on that subject. He seemed to be a very honest and candid man, and he stated that he objected to the payment of these claims until he ascertained that it had been the custom, and he simply followed the custom.

I did not make the statement for the purpose of calling in question his accuracy, because my impressions of the paying teller were very favorable, nor the conduct of the Secretary of the Senate, whose attention, I presume, has not been called to it, but simply to show that it was necessary to guard by legislation this rather loose mode of doing business.

Mr. CLARK. I was not calling the attention of the Senate to it for the purpose of preventing legislation. I desire that there should be legislation; but I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that this morning I have been in conversation and examination with the clerk, and he says he was misunderstood by the Finance Committee on that point. He did not mean so to be misunderstood, and I can find only one instance where money has been drawn from any fund but the appropriate one.

But while I am up I will call the attention of the Senate to another practice which I think is a wrong one; and that is this: we appropriated $42,790 67 for lithographing. The clerk, Mr. Wagner, supposed that he had that fund on hand, but on going to the Department he found on examination that the fund was very nearly exhausted, that $40,000 of it had been withdrawn, not by him, not by the Secretary of the Senate, but that the officers at the Treasury Department had paid it out upon the requisition of Mr. Défrees, the Superintendent of Public Printing, for lithographing. The practice is wrong. I think it ought to go through the office of the Secretary of the Senate; else the Secretary of the Senate can never know what his fund is. That was done without his knowledge until the clerk went up there to see how the fund was, and supposing he had that fund, he found it was gone. That is clearly wrong. We find the officers of the Senate very ready indeed to comply with any suggestion made by the committee in regard to any of these matters.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FOOT. I move to take up Senate bill No. 43, relating to the duties of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, with a view to recommit it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 43) relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. FOOT. I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, mostly ladies, praying for an amendment of the Constitution so that it shall not be construed in favor of slavery; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of Edward Williams, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of lands to that State in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections sold for the benefit of certain Indian tribes; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, recommending the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, on the American side; which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and be printed.

The memorial was so referred; and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 120) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 30) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman; which was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and take up Senate bill No. 24.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 24) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from the Dalles of Columbia river to a point at or near the mouth of Owyhee river, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think I can save the time of the Senate by the statement that the Committee on Public Lands have amended the two bills granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of wagon roads, so as to make them conform to the bills of last year granting lands for similar purposes to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, putting in all the safeguards and restrictions that are to be found in those two measures.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to grant to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the Dalles of Columbia river to a point on Snake river at or near the mouth of Owyhee river, alternate sections of public land, designated by even numbers, for three sections in width on each side of the road; and if it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of the road is definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof so granted, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, the Secretary of the Interior is to set apart from the public lands of the United States, as near to these even sections as may be, so much land as shall be equal to the lands the United States have sold, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or preemption has attached. The lands thus granted and selected are to be held by the State of Oregon for the purpose stated, but the lands to be selected for, are in no case to be more than fifteen miles from the road. All lands heretofore reserved to the United States by act of Congress, or other competent authority, are to be reserved from the operation of the act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of the road through them, in which case the right of way is granted. The lands thus granted are to be disposed of by the Legislature of the State for the purpose stated, and for no other; and the road is to be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charge upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States. The road is to be constructed with such width, graduation, and bridges as to permit of its regular use as a wagon road, and in such other special manner as the State of Oregon may prescribe.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was in section one, line seven, after the word "by," to strike out "even" and insert "odd," so as to read, "alternate sections of public land designated by odd numbers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight, after the word "road" to strike out:

And in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to set apart from the public lands of the United States, as near to said even sections as may be, so much land as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or preemption has attached; which lands, granted and selected as aforesaid, shall be held by the State of Oregon for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That lands to be selected for and on account thereof shall in no case be more than fifteen miles from said road.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied in the construction of said road, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses, and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say: that a quantity of land, not exceeding thirty sections, for said road may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any ten continuous miles of said road are completed, then another quantity of land hereby granted, not to exceed thirty sections, may be sold; and so from time to time, until said road is completed; and if said road is not completed within five years, no further sales shall be made, and the land remaining unsold shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARDING, the bill (S. No. 23) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the southern or eastern boundary of said State; was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was drawn-in the same form as the preceding bill, the road to be from Eugene City, by way of the Middle Fork of the Willamette river and the most feasible pass in the Cascade range of mountains near Diamond peak, to the southern or eastern boundary of Oregon.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was in line seven of section one to strike out the words "southern or," so as to read, "to the eastern boundary of the State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine of section one to strike out "even" and insert "odd," so as to read, "designated by odd numbers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line ten to line twenty-three of section one in these words:

And in case it shall appear, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, that the United States have sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, as that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to set apart from the public lands of the United States, as near to said even sections as may be, so much land as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or preemption has attached, which lands, granted and selected as aforesaid, shall be held by the State of Oregon for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That lands to be selected for and on account thereof shall in no case be more than fifteen miles from said road.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied in the construction of said road, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses; and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say: that a quantity of land not exceeding thirty sections for said road may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any ten contiguous miles of said road are completed, then another quantity of land hereby granted, not to exceed thirty sections, may be sold; and so from time to time until said road is completed; and if said road is not completed within five years, no further sales shall be made, and the land remaining unsold shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed. The title was amended by striking out the words "southern or" before "eastern."

WILLIAM PORTER AND WILLIAM LURKINS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 39.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 39) for the relief of William Porter and William Lurkins was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The original bill introduced by Mr. Howe recited that the steam-tug B. F. Davidson was built in 1860 and the W. K. Muir in 1862, within the United States, on account of Henry C. Greenleaf, a citizen of the United States, and of William Lurkins, an alien, who has resided within the United States since 1845, having arrived a minor between sixteen and seventeen years, and declared his intentions to become a citizen on the 4th April, 1853, and who, believing himself to be a citizen of the United States, made the oath of citizenship and ownership required to procure the enrollment and license of the tugs at the port of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on account of which the tugs have been seized by the collector of customs of that port; that Lurkins did, on the 15th August, 1863, obtain his second papers, and is now a lawfully naturalized citizen of the United States, and has applied to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue enrollments and licenses for these tugs to Lurkins and William Porter, a citizen of the United States, who is now the owner of the interest of Greenleaf, which application was denied for want of authority, with a recommendation to apply to Congress for relief; and that the services of these tugs are indispensable to the marine of the port of Milwaukee; and it therefore proposed to authorize the collector of any port in the United States, on the application of the owner or owners of these tugs, being citizens of the United States, to enroll and license them in the same manner and upon the same terms as if Lurkins had been a citizen of the United States when the tugs were built; and to release the tugs and Lurkins from all penalties and forfeitures incurred by his taking the oaths and causing the tugs to be enrolled and licensed and run in the coasting trade.

The Committee on Commerce reported an amendment to strike out the entire bill, including the preamble, and to insert:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir, now owned by William Porter and William Lurkins, of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, upon such terms, not inconsistent with law, as to him shall seem just and proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A bill to authorize the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir.

ALMOND D. FISK.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, Senate bill No. 112, for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk, was taken up and recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HOWE subsequently said: I move to reconsider the motion which was submitted just now by the Senator from Rhode Island. I was not aware what the bill was that the Senator asked to have recommitted, and he was under a misapprehension in supposing that I agreed to the recommitment of it. I do not wish it to be recommitted at present, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with the matter to be able to consent to that motion now. I have no objection to the motion to recommit being entered, if that is deemed desirable, but I wish the vote recommitting the bill to be reconsidered, and I understand the Senator has no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion, and can be made; but that does not necessarily carry along with it the consideration of the motion at the present time.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the Senator from Rhode Island consents to the reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, then, the vote will be regarded as reconsidered, and that brings the bill before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to state that I made the motion to recommit Senate bill No. 112 supposing that the motion had the assent of the Senator from Wisconsin, otherwise I should not have made it; but I do not wish that bill to be considered by the Senate until it has been recommitted. When the bill was brought up before I stated that I thought there was an adverse interest on the part of one of my constituents, but the Senate was told that the adverse interest was satisfied to have the bill passed here and contest it in the other House. That was an entire mistake, besides being, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] remarked, an exceedingly loose way of transacting business.

There is an adverse interest, and it can be heard much better before the committee certainly than it can be here in the body. Of the merits of it I know nothing whatever. I merely want the parties to have a fair hearing; and I wish it to be understood that I do not desire to have the bill taken up before it shall be again considered by the committee; and although I now withdraw the motion at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin because I made it supposing that he agreed to it, I shall renew it again.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection to that, but I wish simply to correct the Senator from Rhode Island as to what was stated when this bill was before the Senate a few days ago. If he understood that I stated that the adverse interest was content to let the bill be passed by the Senate, he was mistaken. I recommended that the bill be passed by the Senate and let the contest be made in the other House.

Mr. ANTHONY. That might have been, but I understood it as I have stated. Let the bill go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued.

STATUTES OF LIMITATION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 42) repealing certain statutes of limitation.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. As originally introduced by Mr. WILSON, it proposed to repeal all statutes and laws limiting the time within which proceedings in criminal or civil courts or courts-martial may be had, so far as they relate to acts done, or crimes or misdemeanors committed, since January 1, 1860; and to repeal all provisions of any statute or laws which limit the time for any proceedings relating to abandonment, confiscation, or forfeiture of real or personal estate.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting:

That whenever, during the existence of the present rebellion, any action, civil or criminal, shall accrue against any person who, by reason of resistance to the execution of the laws of the United States, or the interruption of the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, cannot be served with process for the commencement of such action or the arrest of such person, or whenever, after such action, civil or criminal, shall have accrued, such person cannot, by reason of such resistance of the laws, or such interruption of judicial proceedings, be arrested or served with process for the commencement of the action, the time during which such person shall so be beyond the reach of legal process shall not be deemed or taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such action.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A bill in relation to the limitation of actions in certain cases.

COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 55. It relates to the time of holding courts in Wisconsin, and has one or two other provisions in it that if passed at all should be called to the attention of the Senate at once.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As the Committee on the Judiciary report a substitute for the original bill, I think it will be necessary only to read the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the reading of the original bill will be dispensed with, and the amendment only will be read. The Chair hears no objection to this course.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill and insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act to enable the district courts of the United States to issue execution and other final process in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where in the district courts of the United States within and for the several districts of Texas, Florida, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Kansas had rendered judgments or decrees prior to the passage of an act approved July 15, 1862, creating circuit courts for said districts, which cases might have been brought, and could have been originally cognizable in a circuit court, the original papers and all other papers now on file in the district courts aforesaid shall be transferred into the clerk's office of the circuit court for the district in which said cases were heard and determined. And it shall be the duty of the district court clerks of said districts, respectively, to have said papers so removed. And it shall also be the duty of said district court clerks to transfer to the offices of the circuit court clerks aforesaid the books of records and journals of the district courts aforesaid, in which are any entries, orders, or proceedings affecting, or in any manner relating to cases which were of circuit court cognizance, or which might have been presented in a circuit court, after having first copied into a book, for that purpose provided, all entries, orders, or other proceedings which may be found in said books, journals, or records relating in any manner to cases which were not of circuit court cognizance, and which could not have been prosecuted in a circuit court.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the necessary costs and expenses of this transfer of books and papers, and for the expense of procuring books to copy the entries and orders above mentioned, and for the copying of said record entries from the original book into the new one, at the same rate of compensation now allowed to clerks of courts for copies from their records, the clerks of the district courts shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, upon the certificate of the judge of the district court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the transcripts thus made into a new book, after said book shall have been certified by the clerk to be full and true copies from the original book, shall have the same force and effect as records as the originals; and that the clerks of the circuit courts aforesaid shall be the custodians of the books and papers transferred to their offices, and their certificate of a transcript of any said books or papers shall be received in evidence with the like effect as it made by the clerk of the court in which the proceedings were had.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for said district of Wisconsin shall hereafter be held as follows: at the city of Milwaukee, in said district, on the second Monday of April and the second Monday of September, and at the city of Madison, in said district, on the first Monday of January in each year, respectively. And all writs, process, and proceedings returnable to the terms of either of said courts as now fixed by law shall be deemed returnable, and shall be continued to the terms of said courts, respectively, as fixed by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended by adding the words, "and for other purposes."

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there was a dispute between the United States and persons who claimed to be owners of certain water-rights in the Potomac, and it was agreed by the proper authorities representing the Government to leave it to arbitration. The arbitrators have rendered an award. The arbitrators were Judge Curtis, late of the Supreme Court, and four or five gentlemen of admitted character. The Secretary of the Interior tells us upon page 14 of his report that he has not paid the amount of the award, because he considered it very extravagant. I think there were three plans and three different places from which it was proposed to bring the water into the District. One cost more and one cost less than the rest, and the arbitrators awarded that the parties should be entitled, if one was adopted, to a certain sum, if the second was adopted, to a certain other sum, and if the third was adopted, to still another sum, and awarded for themselves as a compensation I think $12,000. The terms of the reference, as I understand, authorized the arbitrators to fix their own compensation. I offer this resolution in order to get rid of the difficulty, whatever it may be:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia inquire whether it is not the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to pay out of the existing appropriation for the completion of the aqueduct for supplying the District of Columbia with water the amount including expenses or any and what part of such award adjudged to be due to certain parties by the award referred to in the report of the Secretary of the Interior of the 5th of December, 1863.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the resolution by substituting the Committee on Finance in place of the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is a matter with which the Committee on the District of Columbia has very little to do, and in regard to which it is not very well informed, and that is, whether certain fees should be paid, pretty large fees, as is alleged by the Secretary of the Interior, to arbitrators who have been selected by the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. The member from Iowa perhaps is mistaken as to the meaning of what the Secretary says on the subject. He speaks of the entire award—the amount awarded to the parties who claim to be the proprietors, and the amount awarded to the arbitrators themselves. I do not see that the Committee on Finance have anything to do with it. The money is in the Treasury, and the question is whether it shall be paid out of the existing appropriation. I thought it proper that the subject should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and more especially as they have now before them I think a subject of the same description relating to the aqueduct in some way or other. Of course, however, I have no preference for one committee over the other.

Mr. GRIMES. According to the explanation which the Senator from Maryland has made, I misunderstood the reading of the report of the Secretary of the Interior; but connected with this subject is the payment of a large sum of money, as I understand, to the persons who claim water-rights in the Potomac river.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that would more properly go to the Committee on Finance than to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not know the amount, but it is a very large amount, as I have been told, and I would rather that it should go to the committee who have charge of the money affairs of this country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no preference as to the committee; but I think the Committee on Finance have nothing to do with this matter. The money is in the Treasury. You have appropriated money for the purpose of completing this improvement; and the Secretary refuses to pay these claims out of that money, because he is of opinion that the amount awarded in the aggregate is too large. It may be or it may not be true. I only propose that the Committee on the District of Columbia, who have subjects connected with it under examination, shall investigate it. I have no objection to the Committee on Finance taking charge of it if they desire to do so; but they probably have enough to do already.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to this matter being sent to the Committee on Finance. We on that committee have enough to do in attending to our proper duties without being obliged to look into the affairs connected with the Washington aqueduct. If we had charge of everything relating to money going out of the Treasury we should have more than we could attend to. I do not know but that there may be some legal question connected with this matter, in which case it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to substitute the Committee on Finance for the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution was agreed to.

SHEPHERD AND CALDWELL.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 110.

Mr. WILSON. I believe the hour has arrived for the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is now in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say to the Senator that I have tried for several mornings to get this bill up; it is short, and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I must be out of the Senate to-morrow morning. I should like to have it taken up this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter K. Caldwell, of Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the amendment of the committee be simply read, as it is a substitute for the original bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the consent of the Senate that course will be followed. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Postmaster General be instructed to allow and pay to the said Shepherd and Caldwell all sums of money remaining due and unpaid, and heretofore withheld by the Post Office Department, for carrying the mails during the years 1854 and 1855 on routes numbered 8818 and 8819, in the State of Missouri; said payments to be made for the time during which service was actually performed on said routes, at the rate of $2,100 per year on route No. 8818, and at the rate of $1,400 on route No. 8819, without making any deduction on account of the refusal of said contractors to enter into new contracts for performing extra service, or on account of relating the same. And the Postmaster General is further instructed to pay to said contractors any sums of money due them for carrying the mails on routes numbered 8819 and 8872, in said State, during the years aforesaid, and withheld by the Post Office Department on account of the rejecting of the two routes first named.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the report read. It seems to me an ordinary claim.

The Secretary commenced to read the report, and proceeded for some time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my request for the reading of it. I cannot understand it. I suppose the committee have examined it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill through, but I believe there is no definite sum fixed in the bill that is to be paid to the parties for whose benefit it is to be passed, but it is left discretionary with the Postmaster General.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator that the amount is definitely fixed under the bill. The parties carried the mail from July, 1854, to about January 1, 1855, one route at $1,560 a year, the other at $2,100. If the report had been read a little further, the reason for this bill would have been seen. After they sent the bids here they found that they had made a mistake, and they immediately wrote to the Department asking to withdraw the bids; but instead of having them withdrawn they remained here and were accepted; that is to say, they proposed to withdraw that part of their proposition to carry daily mails instead of tri-weekly mails at a certain additional sum. The bids were accepted for doing tri-weekly service and they entered into contracts to that effect, and having performed the service for six months the Post Office Department then sent to the parties to enter into an additional contract for daily service. They refused to do that, and gave up the routes. Then the Post Office Department refused to pay them anything.

The letters were here withdrawing the bids before they were opened. I hold that a man has a perfect right to withdraw the bids when they have not been acted on; unquestionably so. It was the opinion unanimously of the Post Office Committee. But this money has been retained. It is about half of $1,400 on one route, and half of $2,100 on the other. I suppose that has been retained, making $1,780, or in the neighborhood of that sum, that was retained on these two routes. They also had two other small routes. The Post Office Department, in order to make up for the amount that had been deducted for damages for their refusing the daily service and reletting the contracts, deducted also what was due on the small routes; and the bill provides that the amount which was withheld on these small horse routes shall also be paid. I suppose the whole amount will vary between one thousand seven hundred and two thousand dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. I have some recollection of this claim. I believe it has been here ever since I have been here, and a good while longer. I think it descended as an heirloom to the Senator from Missouri from his predecessor, (Mr. Green.)

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think the question has ever been here in the Senate before. There was a bill introduced into the House of Representatives to pay the claim, and it was neglected there. It was unanimously reported by the Post Office Committee there and neglected. It never has been in the Senate to my knowledge. I have never heard of its being here before.

Mr. GRIMES. It is certainly my recollection that it has been here.

Mr. HENDERSON. A different claim may have been, but this claim, I think, has never been in this body before.

Mr. GRIMES. The main features of it were like this, then.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know nothing of the features of that.

Mr. GRIMES. It strikes me that this is one of the very class of claims that ought to be referred to the Court of Claims to adjudicate. We reorganized the Court of Claims a year ago, and gave them unlimited jurisdiction in cases of this kind; and it was understood at that time, and, indeed, expressly provided, that all questions of damages growing out of an express or an implied contract should go to that court, where they could be fairly investigated according to the settled rules in cases of this description. If we are going to keep up the Court of Claims, if we are going to be at the expense of paying five judges and three attorneys to represent the Government there why not send these claims there? It may be that two or three gentlemen here may be satisfied as to the justness of this claim, but I am not satisfied myself from what I know of it, and from my recollection of it, sufficiently to vote for it, although I may be doing injustice to the claimants in this case by voting against it.

Mr. HENDERSON. You certainly would be. Mr. GRIMES. It ought to be referred to the tribunal that Congress has established for the purpose of adjudicating on precisely such cases as this. It has no business here.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is evidently mistaken, and he has his mind prejudiced about some other claim of which I have no knowledge whatever. If there is any just claim now pending before either of these bodies or ever was pending before them, this is certainly one. I know the circumstances perfectly well, and it is a claim that ought long since to have been allowed and paid. These gentlemen are two most excellent farmers of my county, worthy, excellent gentlemen, and men who really, I suppose, ought never to have entered into business of this sort. They made a mistake in making out their bid, and after sending it here asked to withdraw it. Immediately thereafter contracts were entered into for tri-weekly service, leaving out that part which referred to daily service; the mistake had been made in the bid for daily service simply. They went on carrying the mail, supposing that that part of the bid for which the contract was made was the only part accepted. After having gone on and done service at an immense loss, as is well known to myself, the Post Office Department required them to enter into new contracts to do daily service; they refused, and then the whole amount due them was retained. The Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. McLellan, with this report submitted to him, says in a letter that the facts appear to be as stated in the report. If so, why send these parties to the Court of Claims? If the Government ever owed anything on earth it owes these men. It is a claim that ought to be paid; it is but just to these parties, it is but just to the Government, that it should be paid.

I hope the Senate will pass the bill. The facts were carefully examined by the Post Office Committee. No objection was made; no gentleman made any objection to it whatever. If there is anything in a committee's examining a claim this is entirely correct. It is but a small claim, and ought to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives insisted upon its amendment to the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, disagreed to by the Senate, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. FRANCIS KERNAN of New York, and Mr. HENRY C. DEMING of Connecticut, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and,

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. GRIMES, and Mr. NESMITH.

COLONIZATION IN TEXAS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order now before the Senate is the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate joint resolution No. 23, to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not press that joint resolution now.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator desires at this hour to go on with a speech, of course I shall give way to him; but as soon as he gets through I hope to have permission to call up the joint resolution and get it passed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There is a special order for to-day, Senate bill No. 45, on which I desire to speak. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to have it taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator; but that does not dispose of the question before the Senate, which is the unfinished business of yesterday. It will require a motion to do it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to postpone it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 45) to set apart a portion of the State of Texas for the use of persons of African descent, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, the present war of slavery against freedom first opened upon the plains of a State which I have the honor in part to represent; there the black flag of piracy was first displayed; for years the relentless war of despotism against liberty was waged with varied success, in disregard of the rules of civilized warfare. As an American, I must say, with profound humility and shame for my country, this unnatural and malignant war had the support of two Administrations, which expended influence and treasure without stint to corrupt the young settlements therein, and to fasten the corroding leprosy of this baleful institution on a free and independent people. In that contest against venial officials and a corrupt institution, we learned that slavery was "the sum of all villainies." And it was then we learned that the colored man possessed the qualities of the soldier.

Guided by this experience, and the knowledge thus obtained, immediately on the fall of Sumter I commenced urging in public speeches and writings the necessity of an emancipation proclamation and the arming of the blacks. I commenced this work as a pioneer, confident that the public sentiment of the country would finally indorse the proposition. Even at that early hour, in my intercourse with the President of the United States, I found him anxiously weighing the grave necessities I was urging, and, with mind and will self-poised, ready to hurl these reserved forces on the rebellion, at the juncture when public sentiment in the loyal States would sustain the act; for it must not be forgotten that such stupendous measures required a political and moral preparation in the public mind to justify such strides in the advance, else the whole fabric of northern society might have been shaken by a counter revolution. Their adoption required in advance the education of the loyal people of the free States to the necessity and wisdom of such measures. For generations the public mind had been taught to regard slavery as a thing sacred to the several States holding slaves; a thing too sacred to be criticised or touched by the stranger; while behind this blind of sacred right the traitor plotted his treason at his leisure, planned his schemes of rebellion, and hatched the political brood of vipers who have at last fastened on the fair form of our Republic, trusting, by their devilish skill and power, to strangle and slay the fairest form of civil government the world has yet seen. It was, therefore, no mean task to eradicate the teachings of many years, and bring the public mind up to the safe condition of support to measures such as proposed in the proclamations of emancipation, and arming the men of color in aid of those measures.

Here in this city, in April, 1861, after delivering a speech in favor of those two propositions, I was notified by many friends if I insisted upon it it would crush our party, and was warned that my life was in danger from the knife of the assassin. Even in my own State I was obliged to keep from public view, for months, the first colored troops we raised therein. And I here express the opinion that had either of these measures been adopted at that date, a counter revolution would have been inaugurated in the house of our own friends. It is well known to the truly able Senator from Ohio that when the proclamations were issued they came near throwing into the hands of the opponents of the Government the political power of the country, which at that date would have been equal to the withdrawal of our armies from the field, the triumph of the rebellion, the overthrow of liberty, the disgrace and ruin of her defenders, while the hopes and liberal aspirations of earth's crushed millions would have been extinguished for generations to come; for the courts of Europe would have acknowledged the confederacy, and rejoiced in the decline of pure republicanism.

In my opinion, when the history of this Administration comes to be written, the proudest page therein will be the record of the fact that Mr. Lincoln had the self-possession, the wisdom, and sagacity to restrain himself and friends from issuing the emancipation proclamations and arming the blacks until public sentiment was well-nigh ripe to sustain him. To have acted thus before the 22d of September would have been to have acted too soon. It would have imperiled the political power of the Government, a matter we could not afford to lose then any more than now.

From the establishment of this nation to the present time, the hand of an all-wise Providence has been seen in directing our destinies. In doing this He has always furnished proper instruments. In founding the country He put forward a man of singular ability in mind and body, a type of the aristocratic age, to lead our armies and direct our deliberations. In this, the second great struggle for life and liberty, He has raised up in the economy of His providence a type of the republican age, a man of the people, uniting prudence and firmness, wisdom and simplicity, integrity and sagacity, generosity and elasticity of spirit, in a singular degree, with that practical knowledge of men and things which places him, head and shoulders, above his peers for all the purposes of government. In the midst of such a storm, with him as the pilot, the ship of State has thus far passed through the breakers which have threatened her on either hand; and posterity will admit to his honor that the most dangerous acts, and yet the most beneficent of his Administration, were the acts of September 22, 1862, and January 1, 1863.

The proclamations of these dates are not valuable because they freed the slaves at the time of their issue. They did no such thing. They reached no slaves within the lines of the enemy; and all the slaves of disloyal masters who were within our lines were free under the law. The country was complaining for lack of a policy, and none were more loud in their complaints than the Senator from Ohio. The proclamations were intended to supply that want of the country—a policy. By following this policy we know that this fearful, wasting struggle will result in a permanent peace, to us and those who come after us; that the cause of the rebellion is to be forever removed from the land, so that on the close of the war, or soon after, the stars and stripes shall float over the heads of none but freemen.

The proclamations of Fremont and Hunter amounted to nothing, except as indications of the course of public sentiment and the rapid ripening of opinion. Had they not been modified they would have been inoperative in freeing the slave. As a matter of course they furnished no general policy; they were but unauthorized efforts to do out of place and time what their superiors were carefully maturing and preparing to do at the proper time. Let it not be forgotten that Mr. Lincoln has had two great bodies of loyal men to carry with him in all his war measures—the party that elected him, and that which supported Judge Douglas and Messrs. Bell and Everett. The first has clamored for action in the direction of the most radical measures. This I know, for I have aided to swell that cry. The latter, following reluctantly at first, actuated, not by party zeal, but from a love of country and liberty, have followed Mr. Lincoln's lead when he has not gone too fast; and his wisdom and prudence have been shown in not breaking with them by going too fast, but in carrying them along with him and his measures.

The policy controlling the conduct of the war has been announced in the several proclamations of the President, and has been accepted by the loyal men of the country, together with that much dreaded measure, the arming of the blacks. This policy is being pressed forward with vigor and energy; and surely it is high time to arm our blacks in the defense of republican liberty when the chief imperialist of Europe has dared to export from

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 43.

Egypt Ethiopian soldiers, and plant them on our southern borders to aid him in his contest with the republicans of Mexico. Such a step, by such a man, is a note of warning to the people of this country, calling for prudential measures, yet measures in harmony with international peace. This is a time for careful and profound reflection on the movements of the armed millions that now crowd earth's surface, and our prayer to Almighty God is that no more such come this way, while duty requires us to arm to the teeth all who are capable of bearing arms in the defense of liberty and right.

Another step remains to be taken under the wise and beneficent policy of the Administration. The colored man is to be freed. To place this beyond question or doubt we must guard against his being reenslaved upon the reconstruction of the Union. This can only be done by an amendment of the Constitution, "declaring that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime, shall be permitted in the land."

The black man freed, and his reenslavement rendered impossible by fundamental law, then comes the last step in the programme: to answer safely, correctly, and forever the question, What is our duty as legislators legislating for posterity? What is our duty toward this disfranchised race? Uneducated, dependent, they look to us as helpless infancy, requiring direction, protection, and to a great extent subsistence, and at this time instruction how to obtain it. Emancipation leaves them in the midst of unfriendly influences and an unfriendly people, who, being forced to accept the emancipation of their slaves, will by all means in their power seek to undo what you and your armies have done. It is proposed by some to settle them down on the old estates of the South; this, in view of the well-known temper of the southern masses, is of doubtful propriety, and will, in my opinion, result in a second civil commotion in the course of a few generations; nor will justice to the black man permit us to hide from our eyes the fact that his quiet requires a removal from the scene of his former servitude and degradation. I cannot do better than recite here the sentiment of the report of the committee on this bill, that the nation should make a reasonable effort to secure for the millions of freedmen proper homes in a habitable and desirable country on our southwestern border, where climate and country will be congenial to the wants of our people of color, and where, by acquiring an undisputed title to the soil and an independent local organization, they may enjoy the privileges of republican civilization, and there concentrate their whole strength for mutual improvement.

In exercising our judgment as legislators without prejudice or passion, and regarding the best interests of both races, we are free to say that it appears good policy for us to concentrate by every prudent means consistent with their free choice the large mass of our freedmen in the country named in this bill.

By this act we solve the question, What shall be done with the negro? which has troubled the dreams of anti-emancipationists, and, I have no doubt, actually retarded the work of emancipation heretofore.

The Territorial Committee very properly have declared that a strong desire for a title to the soil is a marked characteristic of the people of our country; and it is reasonable that the man of color should partake of this feeling. We presume that it will not be disputed that a quiet title thereto is indispensable to the proper development and improvement of any country whether in possession of whites or blacks, and that an unsettled title is the worst form of agitation that can afflict any family or race in time of peace—a condition to be deprecated, to be avoided. Wisely your committee express the fear that this will be the fate and future of the freedmen if they remain in the older States once slave, for the majority race, by the aid of courts and laws, will keep their rights and interests unsettled in each of those States, unless by fundamental enactment the government of those States should be placed in the hands of colored men. This would be impossible if attempted; hence the immediate wants of the country, as well as common equity, impose upon the Government in its attempts to quiet the disturbed social structure of the South the necessity of founding a community where the men of color will be the majority race, possessing undisputed sovereignty over their own affairs, and all the rights which spring from eminent domain.

Observation and experience teach us that the black man cannot hold his ground against the grasping cupidity of the white so long as the theater of competition is confined to northern latitudes. Experience further teaches that the man of color is safe from the cupidity of the white man when the tropical climate becomes his ally and protection. When he has reached the point of the tropical or semi-tropical lands, the vigor of his constitution makes him lord of the soil, so that the destiny of the whole tropical belt, in our opinion, is to pass under the future empire of the educated and civilized children of our freedmen.

Mr. President, with these convictions, it appears to me expedient that we make an earnest effort to secure a country of sufficient capacity for the accommodation of four million persons, should so many wish to go thereto; for be it understood that we leave to all the right of choice to go or stay in the older States; yet, while doing this, we cannot refrain from expressing the conviction in the most formal and solemn manner that it is the duty of the man of color to remove with his family and effects to the land indicated in this bill, and to induce his people to accompany him, having in his mind the noble purpose to concentrate his race in that locality with the view of gaining the support, protection, and power that numbers will afford.

While we admit that there is now a large measure of sympathy for the colored race developed in the public mind by the antagonism of this war, and the struggles over him and his interests between the contending sections of the white race, yet on the close of the war, when human passions return to their former course, the anger of the white man is stilled, the passions and affections involved by this armed antagonism sink to repose, and the public mind returns to the various channels of business, commerce, and self-interest, the known cupidity of our race will again assert its sway and hold in abeyance the now well-developed sympathy for the colored man produced by this rebellion. Especially will this be true in the States once slave, for there the white population will regard the negro as an enemy, and treat him accordingly.

Can we expect the white man to be less selfish toward the man of color than he is toward his own race? Look at the conduct of your own people toward one another. Do not oppression, fraud, and wrong curse the land? Are not the weak and unprotected borne down. Will the man who tramples in the dust the rights of his own kindred and race be less exacting, less oppressive with the man or race of men to whom he is disposed to credit much of the disquiet of his country? The supposition is preposterous. Let us, then, form our own judgment by the heartlessness of the general mass of our people, and not by the philanthropy of the few; for, in my opinion, what has been the history of the two races in the past will be their history, to a great extent, in the future if they remain associated in this country as majority and minority races.

This question, sir, after all, is a question of majorities—to remain such through all coming time; for the prejudice, unfortunate as it may appear to some, which the white race entertains to a legal and honorable amalgamation of the African with the people of this country, will preserve a dividing line between them as long as the world stands; nor should Senators hide from their eyes the fact that without this legal and honorable admixture of the African blood with that of our race the former can attain to neither social nor political equality. I give it here as my opinion that the individual politician or political party that comes before the country on the platform of amalgamation, either expressed or implied, will be crushed as by an avalanche. Then the freedom we achieve for them is not such freedom as their long-suffering, their universal loyalty, and important services in this rebellion demand at our hands.

With this social and political inequality it is to be expected that they can develop to that point to which they are capable? Is it for us to leave such a mass of disfranchised labor to the caprice and cupidity of the capitalists of the ruling race, many of whom are as heartless as the slave-master? To leave such an element in our social structure is to present the strong temptation to introduce an aristocracy as dangerous to our republican form of government as that we are now struggling to subdue.

Unless you can assure them social and political equality, I submit that it is a duty we owe ourselves and our children after us to separate them from us and place them in a position to govern and care for themselves. Give them a country of their own; give them homes, actual title to the soil; give them the rights and franchises springing from the actual dominion of the country where they reside. Exercise over them for the time being a territorial government, selecting officers whose every pulsation will be in sympathy with them. Thrown upon their own resources, thus educated and elevated, by having a country they can claim as their own, all the circumstances reminding them of their slavery and degradation being absent, they, in my opinion, would soon demonstrate to the world capacity for self-improvement and self-government that will exceed the most sanguine expectations of their friends.

My second reason is, we can thus plant at the door of Mexico, which is a semi-tropical country, four million good citizens, who can step in at any time, when invited, to strengthen the hands of that Republic.

The place of the black man in the older States will soon be filled up by foreign immigrants, who, in filling the vacuum, will give no shock to the sensibilities of a kindred race or endanger the future peace of the country in the process of naturalization, which will incorporate them into the mass of our people without reducing the blood or changing the mutual status. In this way do we avoid all the disastrous consequences which must follow from that repugnance to legal amalgamation with the African almost universal among the people of the North and Northwest. Therefore policy of the highest order requires that we establish on our southern border an independent, self-sustaining, and self-reliant people, loving liberty, and ready to protect it, whose first effort to illustrate the principles they have derived from us may perchance be a combination to expel the imperial eagles from lands once consecrated to republican liberty.

Shall we extend to colored men the opportunity of voluntarily separating from us? That conceded, all obstacles to this humane design at once vanish. I do not propose to remove them at the expense of the Government. They must go, as other emigrants do, at their own expense. The sum required for the journey can easily be brought within the limits of their resources.

First of all, therefore, the land of their destination, their land of promise I think I may say, must be easy of access. They should be able to move there, as did many of our ancestors when seeking their western homes, in wagons, overland, taking their wives and children, their household furniture and their agricultural implements with them. The country should be adjacent to the sea-coast and traversed by navigable streams, so that colonies or companies may be able to reach it in a body, should emigration in large numbers be desirable.

Such a location, Mr. President, is the country selected by the provisions of this bill. It is bounded upon the south by the Gulf of Mexico, on the east by the Colorado river, on the west by the Rio Grande, on the north by almost impassable mountains, securing them from the inroads of hostile Indians. Through Kansas or southwestern Missouri and the Indian country, it can be reached over the best natural roads in the world, through friendly and sympathizing communities. From Louisiana the way is direct by the Red river or the Gulf. In respect to location no territory on the face of the globe is more desirable for the habitation of the black man.

Now permit me for a moment to refer to the resources of this section and its natural adaptation to the requirements of the colored man. First and foremost, the climate is congenial to his nature; the soil is universally arable, and produces bountifully with moderate cultivation; the surface is fine, deep prairie, yet supplied with timber adequate to the wants of the settler, presenting no obstacle to the opening up of farms. Such is the dwelling-place to which your committee desire to invite the emancipated colored man. It is believed that the President of the United States, were he authorized, could, by proper exertion on his part, obtain title to the greater portion of this territory on the most reasonable terms.

In this connection I call the attention of the Senate to the following extracts from Brannan's Texas, 1857, page 22, which the Committee on Territories have appended to their report on this bill:

"I have, for convenience, divided the State by certain arbitrary designations, as follows, namely, northern counties, western counties, &c.

"Western Texas is an extensive country, and has many varieties of soil and productions. Excepting on the bottom-lands of the rivers and water-courses, the people are mostly engaged in stock-raising, many of them exclusively, and others in connection with farming. The region below 30° and west of the Rio Grande is very subject to long droughts during the summer; still the crops on the bottom-land seldom fail, no portion is sickly, but all is favorable to man and beast. The principal grass on the prairies is the far-famed mesquit, deservedly renowned for its universal abundance and nutritious qualities. During all the winter season, and after it has become sore and yellow, cattle and horses will eat it with the same avidity and benefit as when green. Of late years large quantities have been cured and baled for distant markets. I would advise emigrants who want good, cheap lands, with plenty of mesquit prairie for stock-range, to purchase on the Nueces, Rio Frio, or some of their branches. This is a desirable part of western Texas, and has as many natural advantages as can be asked by any reasonable man. Land sells from $1 50 to two dollars per acre. The timber on the streams is pecan, hackberry, several kinds of oak, and mulberry; on the prairies are much live-oak and mesquit timber. There are many other portions of the West where the land is better adapted for raising cotton, but none that will so well suit the emigrant of moderate capital, and fill the measure of his utmost expectations and desires."

Of the upper portion of this territory Cordova says, page 49:

"The valley of the Rio Grande is in the vicinity of 32° north latitude, and for one hundred miles is capable of sustaining a large and prosperous population. It grows fine wheat, corn, fruits, and a variety of vegetables, all of the best quality, and is proverbial for producing excellent grapes, from which a native wine of very good quality is made. There are between fifteen and twenty thousand Americans and Mexicans already in the neighborhood of El Paso, and the valley is highly cultivated for many miles, beautiful gardens, with fine apricots, peaches, plums, and various other fruits, abounding."

In Moore's Description of Texas, page 8, he says:

"In the western countries the prairies are beautifully diversified with small groves of timber; most of the prairies of this level region, however, are entirely open, and resemble broad grassy lakes. The soil of the prairies is remarkably uniform in its character throughout the whole country, consisting generally of a black vegetable mold, varying from four inches to four feet in depth, resting on beds of sandy or clayey loam. This soil differs but little in fertility from the soil of the bottom-lands, and is covered with a dense mass of grass, affording an inexhaustible supply of pasturage to the cattle of the southern planters. There is probably no class of men upon the globe who can live more independently or with less care than the herdsmen of Texas. Their herds of cattle feed out upon the prairies or in the wooded bottoms during the whole year, and require almost as little attention as the wild deer." * * *

"Many of the Texan farmers own several thousand head of cattle, and derive from them a very large income."

Again, on page 13, he says:

"The ordinary crop of cotton in the level and undulating regions is from a bale to a bale and a half to the acre; of maize, from forty to sixty bushels; of potatoes, from four to eight hundred bushels. Two crops of maize and potatoes are frequently raised the same year; both the common potato and yam, or sweet potato, thrive well."

"The few attempts that have been made to cultivate sugar, tobacco, and silk, prove that these productions can be raised with great facility, and will, within a short period, become the staples of the country. It is found that the sugar cane attains a larger size in Texas than in Louisiana; and, as the climate is milder, a larger portion of the plant matures; consequently the product of sugar to the acre is considerably greater in the former country."

Some of us, were it possible, would be glad to set aside South Carolina or Florida as the future home of the colored man. I have frequently gone so far myself as to say that I hoped the time would come when the footprint of the white man should not be found on the soil of South Carolina. But to-day we are deliberating for the good of the colored man and the peace of future generations. I think we can afford under present circumstances to sacrifice all feeling to such a noble end.

We may slay all the male traitors of South Carolina, and yet, at the close of the rebellion, to their wives and children, being in occupation and holding the fee of the land, amnesty and pardon must necessarily extend. If we should succeed in settling the black man upon some portion of those States he would be persecuted and oppressed so that his life would be a burden to himself, and his title to his home held by an uncertain tenure. It is a well-founded presumption that the slaveholder and the members of his family will always hate the person who has been released from their service against their consent, and will continue to persecute him to the latest generation.

It is not possible to reëducate a whole population like that of the South, or change their prejudices as to their former slaves. The idea of depopulating an entire State to make a place for new inhabitants is not likely to gain much favor. It is a question of morality whether it should be done.

The same objections would hold in respect to Florida as to South Carolina. In addition, its unsettled sections are densely wooded, and a large proportion of the territory is waste, untillable land. The opening up of a farm would be a work of time and money. What we need for the immediate necessities of this people is a locality that will come as near yielding an spontaneous support as can be obtained, and especially one where the herds of stock may support themselves all winter by grazing, as well as during the summer months. In Florida settlements would be widely separated from necessity, but on the territory of the Rio Grande they would be compact. In South Carolina, Florida, and the States once slave, the colored people would be among those who would despise them. On the territory of the Rio Grande they would have friendly Indians upon the north-east, and on the east Texas, which consulted, and consenting in the settlement, would become their friend and protector. On the west Mexico, whose inhabitants would give the colored man a friendly welcome, associate with him as an equal, and if he desired it, would grant him the privilege of citizenship. There would be marrying and giving in marriage. The institution of matrimony would be honored and respected among them. The blur of illegitimacy would be forever wiped away from their posterity. This people would stand before the world a respected community and an honored Commonwealth.

Neither South Carolina nor Florida are adapted to grazing, while the territory of the Rio Grande is eminently so. If I may be allowed the expression, I would call it the elysium of stock. If you had seen, as I have, during the months I was stationed there, the immense droves of cattle, horses, and sheep subsisting throughout the whole year, troubling the owner no more than the wild deer, you would acknowledge that my statements are unexaggerated.

The subject of expense has been mooted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I respectfully submit to him and to the Senate what detriment is likely to follow to the public Treasury from vesting in the Government a title to land the only claimants to large bodies of which will be traitors. In doing this great act of justice to the colored man the question of expense should not be raised. But in my opinion, Mr. President, the policy proposed, if adopted promptly and heartily, will, instead of a public burden, prove highly remunerative to the country. In a few years this territory of the Rio Grande would far outstrip any State in this nation in the production of sugar, cotton, rice, the other cereals, and the herds of stock. A country teeming with such an abundance of the prime essentials to human sustenance would soon refund any amount paid by the Government.

The chief portion of the expense of emigration must be paid by the colored man himself. And what greater incentive to industry and economy can he have than the prospect of a removal to a section which seems to me especially designed by nature for his country and his home? If properly encouraged by the people and by Congress he will not ask the hand of public or private charity to pay the cost of his transportation thither. From the day the well-assured hope of such a destination is held out to him will date those stimulating efforts at elevation and culture which must precede the independence of his race.

The last section of the bill under consideration provides for placing the great work in the hands of the commissioner of emigration. This gentleman has been engaged upon the subject for fifteen or twenty years, laboring assiduously, and I believe with considerable success, in molding public opinion to the absolute necessity of a separation of the two races. He is a man of ability, of integrity, a Christian whose sympathies are with the race proposed to be benefited by the bill. In my opinion, no one can be found to whom the important duty may be more safely intrusted.

This bill also provides for diverting the funds already appropriated for colonization purposes abroad to the present object. That fund was originally $600,000. But little of it has been expended. It is believed that this amount will be ample to carry out the provisions of this bill.

We devote immense tracts of land and millions of money to a few thousand savages, who are not producers in any sense, but consumers of the nation's wealth. It is true they have a claim on us as the original owners of the country; but have the negroes no claim? Have not they and their fathers for centuries toiled to build up our country and our country's wealth without pay or reward? I trust the Senate will now admit this claim, and permit us to pay, by this poor boon, a debt which has accumulated through generations past.

The country set apart by the provisions of the bill is to furnish homes to four million civilized beings, who in a few years will become extensive producers, and I here venture to repeat the assertion which I have made heretofore, that the territory of the Rio Grande, settled as proposed, will in a few years outstrip in the production of cotton and sugar any of the old States, and will amply remunerate us for any present outlay.

By the theory of the bill, the removal of our colored people must needs be slow, as the movement into their own country would be at their own control. As they thus gradually withdraw, on the close of the war and the establishment of peace, their places will be surely supplied by the numerous immigrants from foreign lands, crowding in almost countless millions to our shores, and thus the much dreaded shock to the labor market and the business of the country will be avoided. I wish this point to engage the attention of the Senate. During the last decade the increase of our population by foreign immigration alone has been two million seven hundred and seven thousand six hundred and twenty-four persons, mostly in the prime of life, and largely of the class that supplies our labor, and it is confidently believed that this amount will be trebled during the decade we are now in. Nor would I be surprised to see that number exceeded on the rendering of the next census. It is likewise known to you that when our Army comes to be disbanded, a sudden and excessive supply of labor will be thrown upon the country, more than will be necessary to fill up the vacuum created by the migration of the blacks.

Such are the provisions of the bill and the policy it foreshadows. The success of that policy of course depends upon the crushing out of the rebellion, which we trust will soon be accomplished.

I have no doubt about the advantages that will accrue to the political party to which I belong, should it pass. It must occur to the mind of every Senator that it will remove, at one stroke, one of the irritating elements which at times has distracted our own party and given political power to our opponents.

I have a higher opinion of the capabilities of the African race than most of my countrymen. Their servile relation has caused us to underrate and undervalue them as a general rule; but what are the facts? They are faithful, confiding, affectionate, industrious, given to neatness, and generally religious, eminently domestic in their habits, and strongly attached to their home. These qualities are sufficient guarantees that when admitted to rights of landholders and rulers in that land, they have adhesiveness enough to form a community of power, and ambition enough to secure for that community the polish of a high civilization. Extend to them that substantial freedom to which they are so justly entitled; grant them power; the privilege of selecting their own rulers; of framing their own laws, and I venture the opinion that the day will soon come when we will be proud of our protégés.

Reared in the Democratic school, I was taught to revere the memory and respect the opinions of Mr. Jefferson on this important subject, which employed much of the most serious reflections of that profound statesman. He says, in the first volume of his writings, page 49:

"Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people are to be free; nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same Government. Nature, habit, opinion, have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them. It is still in our power to direct the process of emancipation and deportation, peaceably, and in slow degree, as that evil will wear off insensibly, and their place be pari passu filled up by free white labor."

Time has exploded his deportation plan. We have neither the ability nor inclination to adopt it. I have indorsed his position, that the two races cannot live equally free in the same State, but have failed to discover why we cannot give them the same freedom we ourselves enjoy under the national Government, through a territorial organization, in a territory where they constitute the majority, leaving the question of admission to a higher position therein to time and to those who come after us.

The last census shows that, at the commencement of the rebellion, there were in the State of Missouri 114,931 slaves; in Arkansas, 111,115; in Louisiana, 331,726; and in Texas, 182,566, making, in the aggregate, 740,338.

It is safe to say that one tenth of the slaves of Missouri, six tenths of those of Louisiana, three fourths of those of Arkansas, and all those of Texas, reinforced by at least one hundred thousand who have been transferred to the west side of the river from Mississippi and the other States, making in all about six hundred thousand, are now in eastern Texas, and will at once, with but little expense to themselves or trouble to us, seek the new Jerusalem.

The foundations for the contemplated community may be laid deep and strong by a single order issued in just nineteen words, namely: "withdraw the white troops from western Texas, and supply their places by colored regiments, giving transportation to their families."

It was demonstrated by the discussion last Saturday that the families of these soldiers are self-sustaining. They can select land, open up farms, while their husbands and fathers are fighting your battles and their own. The pay of the soldier will aid them in this praiseworthy effort for independence.

At the close of the war we should adopt the same policy in mustering out of the service our gallant regiments as was followed, at the close of the war with Mexico, in respect to the troops in California. Muster out the colored regiments west of the Colorado if they desire it, allowing them transportation pay to the place of enrollment. This method, allowing half of them to be men of family, with four to a family, would give five hundred thousand settlers.

If I could direct the policy of the Government I would tender homes to the colored soldiers west of the Colorado, and to the white soldiers the confiscated estates of traitors east of that line, mustering them out at such points contiguous to their contemplated homes as they might designate. What greater incentive to fidelity to the interests of their country could be placed before them?

My sanguine temperament may mislead me, but I am clear in the conviction that as soon as this settlement is a fixed fact the colored race from Canada to the Gulf will be attracted to it. Every avenue to it will soon be crowded by emigrants hastening thither in every kind of vehicle from a wheelbarrow to a mail coach.

Should the Senate adopt this bill, I can tell the man of color that the hour of his deliverance from the bondage of Egypt has come, and that unless he removes he is doomed to sink into a hopeless minority in the older States for all coming time. The last census tells the story of his future.

The increase of population to this country by foreign immigration alone exceeds the increase of the slave and free people of color in the same period nearly three to one; that of the former being 2,707,624, and that of the latter but 796,947.

You can infer from this the chances of changing the relation of the races by force of numbers. We must ever remain the majority race, and consequently the rulers; they the minority race with no hope of relief in the older States. The colored man must change his latitude to hold his ground. Wisdom, policy, and a military necessity suggest that he change it at once.

I submit the bill, confident that the importance of its provisions will challenge the serious attention of every Senator. Our gallant Army in the field, with the proclamations of the President and laws in aid thereof, insures freedom to the slave, while the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which will no doubt be passed by this Congress and sanctioned by three-fourths of the States, secures the colored man from reenslavement, and this plan extends to him substantial freedom.

Thus that question which has disturbed the peace of the nation during my entire life will be fully settled. Then the Republic can commence her career anew, freed from all her clogs. With the shades that dim her lights removed, she will stand forth before the world a guide to the nations, with power sufficient to command the respect of men and virtue sufficient to secure the approval of the divine Ruler.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill with a view of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution equalizing the pay of troops.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. COWAN to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That from and after the passage of this resolution the soldiers of the United States of America of the same grade and service shall be entitled to the same pay, rations, and pension.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting what I send to the Chair:

From and after the 1st day of March, 1864, the soldiers of the United States of the same grade and service shall be entitled to receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay, emoluments, pensions, and bounty.

The high bounties now offered by the Government will cease on the 1st day of March, and then persons enlisting into the service for three years will be entitled to receive the sum of $100. I have, therefore, in this amendment, fixed the date when this joint resolution shall commence operation, so as to begin at that time. I think, in the form proposed in the amendment, it covers everything, and puts them on the equality that is intended.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire whether, if the amendment to the amendment should be adopted, it will be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment as it is adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HOWE in the chair.) In the opinion of the Chair it would not be in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to say something on this proposition. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down. I will ask for the reading of an amendment which I shall offer to the substitute of the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts shall be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, to strike out all of the substitute after the words "this resolution," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all negroes and mulattoes, by whatever term designated, in the military service of the United States be, and the same are hereby, declared to be discharged from such service, and shall be dismissed as soon as practicable; but the President of the United States may retain such of said negroes and mulattoes as he shall deem proper in the military service as teamsters and laborers; and the commanders of the respective regiments to which said slaves may be attached shall issue to their owner or owners a certificate of their employment in the service of the Government.

And be it further resolved, That every loyal owner of any slave that has been heretofore, or that may hereafter be, taken into the service and for the use of the United States shall be entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation for the services of such slave for the time such slave may have been or may be in such service, to be paid quarterly; and where any slave may have been killed or died through exposure, or may have been disabled by such service, the owner or owners of all such slave or slaves shall be entitled to such compensation as will reasonably satisfy them for all damages that he, she, or, they may have sustained by reason of the death or disability of any such slave or slaves; and where any such slave or slaves may become a fugitive and be not returned to the owner, the United States shall pay the owner or owners the reasonable value of the service of such slave or slaves.

And be it further resolved, That the owner or owners of any slave entitled to pay or compensation as hereinbefore provided for, may make out his, her, or their account therefor against the United States, and upon filing the same at the Treasury Department, sustained by such vouchers and proofs as are required ordinarily to support accounts against the United States, the same shall be audited and paid by the proper officers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if he proposes to offer this proposition as a substitute for the resolution before the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS. Not at the present time. I know it is not in order; but I propose to say something upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; and I merely desired to have the proposition which I had drawn up read for the information of the Senate. The subject, as I understand, is now before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a great man once asked the question what a public man was worth who would not stand or fall by a great principle. I expand that question, and I ask, what is any man worth who will not stand or fall by a great principle? Sir, I have that amount of value at least.

Some gentlemen have said truly that I was fond of recurring to the past. When I make a retrospect of the past, even for only a few years, how great and melancholy is the contrast with the present! Then we had peace, fraternity, unity, prosperity, power, and the respect of the nations of the world. That retrospect gives me a mournful pleasure. I love to dwell upon those halcyon times, times which I sincerely apprehend have left this country to return no more, at least so long as myself, a much older man than you, and you, sir, [Mr. HOWE in the chair,] shall be living.

Mr. President, I have seen somewhere a fiction defined to be "the madness of the many for the benefit of the few." Parties are inherent, and indeed inevitable, in all popular Governments, and generally arise in all Governments. When parties are formed on diverse opinions of principles and measures of policy, and their effects upon the Government and the country, and the differences of their probable effects are investigated and maintained with truth and candor, they are useful in forming a correct public opinion, in repressing maladministration, and in upholding liberty and the true spirit of the Government. But when these parties turn away from truth and reason, disregard fundamental principles, and support men not because of their fitness for office, their virtues, intelligence, and fidelity to public trusts and measures; not because they are wise and just and promotive of the public good, but because they promise to subserve the ends, the ambition, and passions of individuals, or to attain or hold power, party then becomes faction.

In the first and purer ages of most free Governments the people generally divide into parties, but the selfishness and arts of the leaders and the credulity of the masses soon cause them to degenerate into factions. Country then becomes absorbed by party, truth and reason by falsehood and passion, and the public good and glory by partisan contests and triumphs. Then there is enacted the "madness of the many for the benefit of the few." The masses surrender their judgment, their will, and their conduct to their leaders, and become their followers and slaves, and ignore wholly the merits of men and measures. Party fealty, the esprit de corps of party, becomes the strongest bond among men, dominates their opinions, lives, and acts, and directs the destiny of the nation. Each succeeding faction becomes more venal, corrupt, and desperate than its predecessor, their conflicts become fiercer, the ligaments of society are loosened, law and order are disregarded, private pursuits and industry are disturbed, property is seized upon by rapacious armed men, liberty and life become unsafe, and the people, growing weary and disgusted with the ever-recurring and never-ending turmoil, for a modicum of tranquillity and security at length accept a despotism and a master. The positions here stated are all proved by the successive factions in ancient Rome, of Marius, of Sylla, of Pompey, Julius Cæsar and Crassus, of Antony, Lepidus, and Octavius, and the natural and inevitable consummation, the establishment of an imperial despotism by Octavius Cæsar. Corroborative examples could be readily adduced from the history of many other countries, ancient and modern, as well as the present deplorable condition of the United States; and the measures, purposes, and spirit of the parties North and South which now rule them, give mournful assurance that they too may add another and incomparably the strongest of the numerous examples which the enemies of free institutions are so fond of citing, to prove that well-ordered and permanent self-government is impossible to be achieved by any people.

It seems to me that the decline of the great Republic has commenced in its early immaturity, and has progressed and is progressing with a rapidity beyond all precedent. I never indulged the dream that it could be immortal, perpetual; but I clung to the faith that it would have its periods of active youth, of vigorous manhood, and sound old age; and that each period would be measured by centuries. If its destiny should be thus early to fall, it will not only be the most untimely but the noblest ruin that was ever mourned by mankind, blasting, beyond all comparison, for the present and through long-coming ages, more of the world's hope.

I never for a moment doubted that the rebellion would be suppressed, and when the news of the disastrous battle of Bull Run reached my town, and there struck down the spirit of every other Union man, I expressed to them my conviction that that reverse would arouse a spirit which would call out the entire resources of the loyal States; and although they might be more slow in being made available, they were so superior in force and endurance and all material wealth, that the rebels must be overwhelmed, and that consummation was only a question of time. I have held to that opinion without ever having a moment of doubt.

I came to the Senate soon after the President and the two Houses of Congress had with unprecedented unanimity declared to the people of the United States and to the world in the clearest language the principles and ends upon and for which the war against the rebels should be conducted. I put my trust and faith in those declarations and in the men who made them, and while they were observed I not only supported their war measures, but gave them personally my fullest confidence. But a new policy for conducting the war, and essentially different from that previously announced by the President and by Congress, began to be evolved. The President has since fully developed and is now fearfully executing it. When he violated the many and distinct and emphatic pledges upon which and by which he was bound to conduct the war, for one, my confidence in him died to live no more. But what I consider to be the great perfidy of the President has not and never will cause me to hesitate to support the Government and the Union of these States in this civil war. I have voted for every measure to strengthen the executive arm that I deemed to be constitutional, and for some about which, both as to constitutionality and policy, I entertained serious doubts, and this because of the great stress of the country, and the desire of the Executive to have them enacted into laws. I shall continue this course of official conduct, not for the President or the party in power, but for the Constitution which I have sworn to support, for the restoration of the Union of the States, and for the common and permanent welfare of my country.

It is this great civil war and its continuance that has brought the President to enormous abuses and usurpations of power, and the people to submit to them so passively. If the war could be closed speedily, they, too, would soon come to an end; but so long as it continues, the only hope of their reformation is in the election of another President; and here arises a mighty motive with those in power and office, and in the receipt of large emoluments, for its continuance. It seems to me, too, that the rebels will rally all their energies for a decisive struggle in the coming campaign. I do not doubt that their great armies will be routed and driven from the field; the mass, however, will fight to extermination before they will submit to the humiliating terms that have been prescribed for them by the President. The rebel armies, unable to maintain great campaigns, will break up into small bodies, and from their swamps and mountain fastnesses will carry on a desolating partisan war for a longer period than Circassia did against Russia; and before it can be terminated by their subjugation, constitutional government and popular liberty throughout the United States may have perished, not for a time, but forever. I have never feared, nor have I now the least apprehension of the permanent overthrow of free institutions anywhere in the United States, by Jefferson Davis and his government; but I am beset by the gloomiest apprehensions that if Mr. Lincoln is reelected, or some other man having his principles, policy, and scheme of government should be his successor, they will perish by him and his government, or by stronger men who will rise up and thrust them from their places.

No men ever charged with the possession and administration of a free Government devised so bold and so extensive a scheme for its revolution, or were so prompt and successful in its execution, as the men who hold possession of the Government of the United States. The strong and fixed attachment of the loyal States to the Union; the general aversion of the people of the free States to slavery, and the fanatical and active hostility of a large sectional party to it; the inauguration of the rebellion exclusively by slave States, and the absorbing devotion of large portions of their people to their peculiar institution; the magnitude of the military power and resources which the rebels brought into the field to support their revolt and achieve their independence; the enormous armies, equipments, and supplies which the United States had to organize to meet successfully their formidable enemy; and the fierceness with which the war has been waged on both sides, have given to ambitious men in power such an opportunity as never occurred before in any country to trample down the Constitution, laws, and liberties of the people, and to seize upon indefinite arbitrary power. Backed by a resistless military force ramified all over the loyal States, the assumptions of power by those in authority have been in proportion to the dimensions of the rebellion, and the people, confounded by the great and threatening danger to the Union and the extent and audacity of those usurpations, have given but little heed to their Constitution, rights, and liberties, thinking that when the terrific storm had passed they would resume their wonted position, security, and vitality. Fatal delusion! Those inappreciable blessings of Government, once yielded by a people, are generally lost forever; they are never regained except at the cost of countless sufferings and seas of blood. The duty that devolved upon the people in this great exigency required high intelligence, virtue, courage, and fortitude; it was at the same time to put down the rebellion, and to hold all their agents, civil and military, strictly and firmly within the limits of their constitutional and legal powers. Had that great duty been performed and the civil and military affairs of the country been wisely administered the rebellion would ere this have been suppressed, the Union and peace restored, and our institutions strengthened and enshrined anew in the hearts of our countrymen and more strongly commended to the acceptance of mankind. The best that can now be done is to occupy as much as possible of that safe anchorage.

Political liberty in England was of Saxon birth. It fell temporarily by the victory of William the Conqueror at Hastings; but the Saxons, who were still much the larger portion of the people, were deeply imbued with its spirit. It soon burst forth vigorously against the tyranny of the feudal system and the Normans, and made vigorous and unceasing conflict with the Plantagenets for their ancient rights; and the sturdy barons, under the feeble John, achieved their reconquest from the throne. This contest between parliamentary privilege and popular liberty on the one side, and kingly prerogative on the other, was resumed and continued throughout the reigns of the succeeding Plantagenets and all the Tudors. The kings claimed the essential powers of Government, both executive and legislative, as of their prerogative; the Commons of England asserted as of their privilege as the third estate, representing the people, that no laws could be enacted or suspended without their concurrence, and that all the rights, privileges, and liberties founded under their Saxon kings, and restored by Magna Charta, were the birthright of every Englishman. This great contest, extending through centuries, was taken up by Hampden and Cromwell and their heroic associates, and brought to a final issue in favor of the privileges of Parliament and the liberties of the people in the reign of Charles I. They were defined more clearly and established more firmly by various acts of Parliament, passed in the reigns of Charles II, William of Orange, and at the accession of George I; and they have ever since been as firmly moored in the British constitution and Government as the isle itself in its ocean bed.

But in our free and limited Government of a written Constitution, President Lincoln and his party, in utter disregard of its limitations and restrictions, are making for him as President claim to the same boundless and despotic powers, executive and legislative, which the Plantagenets, the Tudors, and the first Stuarts contended for in England as appertaining to the kingly prerogative, through so many generations of convulsive and bloody struggle, and which they ultimately lost, after the longest, truest, most steady and heroic devotion to their rights and liberties by the people of England that is to be found in the history of mankind. Those inestimable rights, liberties, privileges, and institutions, secured forever, it is to be hoped, to that people by their appreciating sense, manly virtues, and invincible fortitude, our ancestors brought with them to this continent; and the founders of our Government thought they had secured them to the people of the United States beyond all changes and chances, by setting them forth as fundamental principles in their written form of Government; and yet the President has seized upon the opportunity of this great rebellion to subvert them for the time, and if he is reelected to the Presidency that subversion will become complete and final. His overthrow, or that of the Constitution and popular liberty, is inevitable; and it is yet in the power of the American people to decide this great issue in favor of Constitution and liberty, if they will throw off their lethargy and arouse themselves to the most important work that has ever been intrusted to man.

Mr. President, no Government could be organized in this enlightened age without adequate provisions for the protection of private property. It is one of the great ends for which society and all government are formed, and consequently it is one of the prominent objects that was attempted to be secured by the Constitution of the United States. The fifth article of the Amendments expresses the principle of the Constitution upon that point in clear and precise language. I will read it:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. President, some gentlemen assume the most extraordinary and absurd position that negroes are not and cannot be the subject of property. Our Constitution recognizes property in slaves. The courts of the United States, which by the Constitution are expressly empowered to decide all cases arising under that instrument, uniformly and in numerous cases have recognized property in African slaves. There is not a civilized country of the earth, where this question ever arose, whose high judicial tribunals have not sustained the same position. Slavery and property in slaves have been upheld by the laws, usages, and practice of nations of the highest civilization from before the first dawn of history. This question has been made, not only in the Supreme Court of the United States, but also repeatedly in the circuit courts of the United States for Ohio and Michigan, and in one case at least the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] appeared as counsel. The courts sustained, not only the right of property in the owners of slaves, but also that where they were fugitive, and escaped into other States, the owner or his agent could go into that State, and, against its express law to the contrary, seize his slave and take him back; and if he was resisted by any persons to the loss of the slave, or they aided the slave to escape, the owner could sue the persons interfering in the United States courts, and recover from them both the reasonable value of the slave and a penalty for their interference. The man who contends in the United States that African slaves are not and cannot be the subject of property is non compos mentis.

In relation to this matter of property in slaves as connected with my own State, how does it stand? We have in Kentucky about, I will say in round numbers, two hundred and fifty thousand negro slaves. Before the commencement of this rebellion they were worth $600 average at least. A colleague of mine in the other House, who is my near neighbor and among the largest owners of slaves in the State, estimates their value according to an appraisement which he has made of some that he placed upon a cotton farm in the South, men, women, and children, at $800 a head; but a moderate and reasonable estimate would be $600 average. Two hundred and fifty thousand slaves at that rate would be worth $150,000,000. That is one fourth part of the aggregate wealth of the State of Kentucky. What does this measure and the series of cognate measures in relation to the same subject contemplate? To deprive the people of the State of Kentucky of $150,000,000 of their property which is guaranteed to them not only by their own constitution and laws, but also by the Constitution of the United States and by all the decisions, both Federal and State, of all the courts in the United States, I believe, with one solitary exception in a State court of Wisconsin, and which has been properly reversed by the revisory judgment of a United States court. Is it not a question of a good deal of magnitude to my constituency whether the President or Congress shall, directly or indirectly, deprive them of that amount of property without any compensation? But, sir, the Congress of the United States, nor the President, have not a particle of jurisdiction or power over the subject to the extent of liberating slaves. Neither has any military officer any more rightful authority to set free a slave in the State of Kentucky than has the levy court of the county of Washington.

Mr. WILKINSON rose.

Mr. DAVIS. I would rather the Senator would reserve his questions until I get through, and then I will answer them with great pleasure; but I prefer not to be interrupted. I say it most courteously to the honorable Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HOWE in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, we have a peculiar and unique Government. We have a Government established by a written Constitution. That Constitution is the law of our Government, and limits all its power and authority. It has been decided again and again by the Supreme Court, and it is the plainest dictate of reason and common intelligence, much less of legal learning, that the Government of the United States cannot claim, or exercise without usurpation, a solitary power that is not conferred upon it by that sole law of its creation. The Constitution was formed by separate, distinct, and independent political sovereignties, each one of those sovereignties within its own limits and jurisdiction being clothed with all political power. They saw the necessity of a common national Government, and consequently of a surrender of some of the highest powers of political sovereignty to that national Government for the purpose of securing the welfare of the whole people of the United States. This surrender of power was almost mainly of the character of those that appertain to the foreign relations of the States or their relations with each other. It is one of the essential features of the system that the domestic institutions, laws, and polity of each State were not surrendered to the General Government, but were retained almost wholly and exclusively by the States.

Now, Mr. President, in the face of the guaranties in the Constitution which I have read, that private property shall not be taken except for public use, and by judgment of law and upon compensation being made to the owner, how can the Government of the United States, in any of its departments, seize and appropriate private property for any other object than public use, public appropriation, public application of the property to some purpose and action of Government? And when it takes private property, even for such ends, how can it presume to take that property, in the face of this provision of the Constitution, without making, or intending to make, compensation to the owners for it?

Mr. President, an error is committed very often in this day, and I think it is for the want of a recurrence to and an examination of the essays and explanations of and that were contemporaneous with the Constitution. Gentlemen attempt to analyze, to define, to enlarge the powers of our Government by comparing it with other Governments. As I said before, our Government is unique. It is formed by a written instrument. That instrument speaks for itself. It was formed upon the general principle of not giving plenary powers to the national Government, but only such as should be delegated to it by the States, and not to be obligatory upon any State that did not ratify it. This principle has been often announced by the Supreme Court, that only such powers are vested in the General Government as are expressly delegated by the language of the Constitution itself or by the necessary, reasonable, and proper implication of that language. A leading feature of the Government is that all the powers vested in the President by the Constitution are enumerated in the second and third sections of the second article; and he is not clothed with a solitary incidental power, but the whole of that unnumbered and indefinite class of powers are vested by the express and unequivocal language of the Constitution itself in Congress, and that only to the extent that they are necessary and proper to enable Congress, or the President, or the judiciary, or any other department or officer of the Government to execute the powers with which it is expressly clothed. Congress may assume and exercise itself at pleasure any of those incidental powers, but the President or any other officer not one of them until authorized by a law of Congress. This Government of limited authority is also by express provisions restricted or forbid to exercise sundry powers; and there is also a direct provision that the express restriction of any powers to the General Government shall have no effect whatever to grant it any additional powers or to enlarge those that are vested by the Constitution.

Sir, what is another general principle of our Government? That all the powers of Government established by the language of the Constitution are expressly in the main parted and divided among three departments, and the powers that are to be exercised by each are expressly enumerated. Then, when a question arises as to the general proposition of the extent of the powers of the Federal Government, or of their investiture in what department or officer, there is but one rule of construction, and that rule is the language of the Constitution itself, and the condition of circumstances of public affairs when it was adopted. There is no other system of government under the sun that can enlighten legislators or the President or courts upon such questions. You may resort to the British Government as it then existed, and the writings of publicists when the Constitution was adopted, to ascertain the meaning, import, and force of terms of art or political science that are introduced into the Constitution, but beyond that you cannot have reference to any Government, not for the purpose of illustrating or ascertaining what are the powers of the Government of the United States, or in what departments and magistracies they may be deposited, but on these questions you have to look to the Constitution alone.

Sir, in construing the Holy Scripture you might as well recur to the Koran, to the Puranas of the Hindoos, to the system of Zoroaster, to the moral precepts taught by Confucius or Seneca or any other great heathen moralist, with as much propriety as you may resort to other systems of government to determine and ascertain what are the powers and what are the depositories of the powers of our Government. Our Constitution is our political Bible, and as such is as much distinct and isolated from the constitutions and governments of all other countries as the Christian's Bible is from all other systems of religion.

Then, sir, I come to this other cardinal principle, which I lay down as an incontrovertible axiom, that wherever the Constitution of the United States by express language establishes and vests a power of government, or guaranties a right, liberty, or privilege to the citizen, such provision of the Constitution cannot be suspended or abrogated, restricted or impaired in its operation by any implication arising from any other of the provisions of the Constitution. I also state this further principle as axiomatic: that the amendments to the Constitution being the last expressed will of the people upon the subject of their Government, like amendments to all laws and constitutions, if there be any conflict express or by implication between the original text and the amendments, the amendments are to prevail, and are to give the supreme and the undoubted law upon the controverted point. Then, sir, I recur to the Constitution and read the provision guarantying the rights of private property in the most explicit language—one of the cardinal ends for which this and all other legitimate Government was created, without which express guarantee of property and other inalienable rights and liberties the people of the United States were not satisfied in the first instance with the Constitution; and I assert that there are no other express provisions overruling them, or conflicting to any extent with them; and that they cannot be nullified, restricted, or affected by any possible implications springing out of the other provisions of the Constitution, or out of the whole of it. Sir, that position in truth and in sound logic ends the controversy. When I read these guarantees of private property, and the emphatic declaration that it shall be taken only for public uses, and then only on just compensation being made, there is an end to the question of the right of the citizen to have a fair price for his property where it is taken for public use. The argument cannot be answered.

Now, sir, what does this joint resolution propose to do? It proposes to take slave property without making any compensation to the owners; and here let me examine the question: What is just compensation for private property? Has the Government of the United States, or any of its authorities or officers, civil or military, the right to wrest a man's property from him without his receiving compensation for it at the time, or within a reasonable period thereafter? I answer, no. If a military officer says that he takes it for the public service, and because the exigencies of that service require him to take it, and that is all he says or does or is authorized to do by his Government in relation to making just compensation for property, and there are no means of making compensation by law, I ask does that satisfy in any sense the requisitions of the Constitution?

The constitutions of the different States have similar provisions in relation to taking private property for public use. The constitution of my own State has a provision almost in the same words, and I believe that most of the State constitutions have the same provision. What have been the adjudications of the supreme court of the State of Kentucky in relation to that provision? The extreme point which they have ruled in relation to the power of the Government in its favor is, that there must be laws in force and effect authorizing the levy of money upon the State for the purpose of making this compensation; and these laws must be executed by the proper court assessing so much money as will be sufficient to pay a fair and reasonable price for the property that is so taken; and they have decided in explicit terms that any state of case or of law short of such a provision as that does not satisfy the requirements of the Constitution. The legal consequence is, that the taking of property, even for public use, under any other state of case, would be a wrong to the owner; and the officer so taking it could be sued and held liable as a trespasser.

Is not that proposition obvious to every man of good sense? Shall the Government any more than an individual, in the exercise, if you please, of its high power of sovereignty, take private property without making or offering to make or having made any provision whatever for its fair value to the owner? Yet such is the practice and the constant practice of our Government. It is in derogation of the Constitution and the rights of property guaranteed to the citizen. The question might well arise when the property was taken from the citizen if compensation therefor should not then and there be made. But until there are laws which authorize the valuation of the property and the assessment of money to pay the owner for it, there is not a pretense that the guarantee of the Constitution has been satisfied.

Here is another violation of this principle by the course of the Government in the practices of its military officers. What power has a United States agent, civil or military, to take private property and to place his own value upon it? What right has a recruiting officer, or the Secretary of War, or the President, to enlist a negro man and to assess $300 as his value, if any be assessed, when, if his time and service were assured to his owner or the hirer from that owner, he would be worth from two to three hundred dollars a year? What right has the Government of the United States, or any of its agents, to seize any property, whatever, that is necessary for the uses of the Army, or for any other branch of the public service, and arbitrarily to assess their own value upon it? There is but one mode in which that can be properly and legally done; and that is for disinterested commissioners or appraisers to be selected by authority of law, to ascertain the fair and reasonable value of the property, whatever it may be; and for the United States to have a course of proceedings ready provided for by law, and to put them in course of execution, for making to the owner of the property the fair compensation for it at the time that he is deprived of its possession. Sir, a Government that acts upon a different principle is oppressive, is tyrannical; it violates flagrantly the requisitions of the Constitution and the rights of the citizen; it does not answer the purposes and ends for which the people organized their Government. They never intended or formed their Government to wrong and oppress them; and the highest obligation of its officials is to be just to the people.

But, Mr. President, a great deal is claimed in this day of insurrection and civil war under the pretext "military necessity." Sir, I deny that there is any such power as that in our Government that will sanction the enormous abuses of power that have been perpetrated during this war. That question was up before the Supreme Court in the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony—a case that arose during the Mexican war. I will read from 13 Howard's Reports a page or two of the opinion that will give the general facts of the case, and the principles that arose and that were decided in it:

"He (the defendant) justified the seizure on several grounds:

- "1. That the plaintiff was engaged in trading with the enemy.
- "2. That he was compelled to remain with the American forces, and to move with them, to prevent the property from falling into the hands of the enemy.
- "3. That the property was taken for public use.
- "4. That if the defendant was liable for the original taking he was released from damages for its subsequent loss by the act of the plaintiff, who had resumed the possession and control of it before the loss happened.
- "5. That the defendant acted in obedience to the order of his commanding officer, and therefore is not liable.
- "The first objection was overruled by the court, and we think correctly."

The opinion then goes on to the second and third objections, which contain the material parts of the opinion, as they bear on the principles decided in the case:

"The second and third objections will be considered together, as they depend on the same principles. Upon these two grounds of defense the circuit court instructed the jury that the defendant might lawfully take possession of the goods of the plaintiff, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the public enemy; but in order to justify the seizure the danger must be immediate and impending, and not remote or contingent. And that he might also take them for public use and impress them into the public service, in case of an immediate and pressing danger or urgent necessity existing at the time, but not otherwise.

"In the argument of these two points, the circumstances under which the goods of the plaintiff were taken have been much discussed, and the evidence examined for the purpose of showing the nature and character of the danger which actually existed at the time or was apprehended by the commander of the American forces. But this question is not before us. It is a question of fact upon which the jury have passed, and their verdict has decided that a danger or necessity such as the court described did not exist when the property of the plaintiff was taken by this court, and the only subject for inquiry in this court is, whether the law was correctly stated in the instruction of the court; and whether anything short of an immediate and impending danger from the public enemy or an urgent necessity for the public service can justify the taking of private property by a military commander to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy, or for the purpose of converting it to the use of the enemy.

"The instruction is objected to on the ground that it restricts the power of the officer within narrower limits than the law will justify; and that when the troops are employed in an expedition into the enemy's country, where the dangers that meet them cannot always be foreseen, and where they are cut off from aid of their own Government, the commanding officer must necessarily be intrusted with some discretionary power as to the measures he should adopt; and if he acts honestly and to the best of his judgment, the law will protect him. But it must be remembered that the question here is not as to the discretion he may exercise in his military operations or in relation to those who are under his command. His distance from home, and the duties in which he is engaged, cannot enlarge his power over the property of a citizen, nor give to him in that respect any authority which he would not under similar circumstances possess at home. And where the owner has done nothing to forfeit his rights, every public officer is bound to respect them, whether he finds the property in a foreign or hostile country or in his own.

"There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may lawfully be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy; and also where a military officer, charged with a particular duty, may impress private property into the public service, or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner; but the officer is not a trespasser.

"But we are clearly of opinion that in all these cases the danger must be immediate and impending, or the necessity urgent for the public service, such as will not admit of delay, and where the action of the civil authority would be too late in providing the means, which the occasion calls for. It is impossible to define the particular circumstances of danger or necessity in which this power may be lawfully exercised. Every case must depend on its own circumstances. It is the emergency that gives the right, and the emergency must be shown to exist before the taking can be justified."

It goes on then further to state that if the commander of the expedition himself, General Doniphan, who gave the order, had been there doing the act of taking possession of the property, he himself would not have been justified but would have been a trespasser, and that the order of a superior to an inferior to do an illegal act still leaves that act, though performed in obedience to positive orders, a trespass, and the subordinate is responsible for it as a trespasser. But the two main principles decided are these: first, private property cannot be seized by a military man unless the danger that creates this necessity be so immediate and impending, the case so urgent, that it cannot wait for the action of the civil authorities; second, where the urgency and necessity is of that character that cannot wait, still, if the property is seized, it is in every instance upon the condition that the Government is bound to make reasonable and just compensation for it to the owner.

Now, sir, these are the two principles which this case establishes; and they are as favorable to the Government and its agents as the provisions of the Constitution can authorize any enlightened court to lay down. They go to the very verge that can be claimed by any military commander whatever, even the Commander-in-Chief.

But, sir, if that case of urgent, impending necessity that cannot wait the action of the civil authorities be upon an officer, although he may justify himself against an action of trespass, yet in establishing such a case of necessity, it to no extent exempts the United States from their liability to make compensation for the property.

Now, sir, the amendments which I propose to offer, if the joint resolution shall assume a shape to make it in order, contemplate two or three movements upon the part of our Government: first, that so far as negroes free or slave are soldiers they shall be disbanded and disarmed; that as many of them as are necessary in the service of the United States as teamsters or laborers may be so retained by the order of the President, but they are to be retained as private property, and commanders of the regiments to which they are attached in the service are to give a certificate of their employment in the service of the United States, and their owners are to be entitled quarterly to a reasonable compensation for their services.

Sir, it would be the wisest policy that this Government could adopt to accept the first branch of my proposition. These negroes should never have been enrolled as a part of the Army of the United States. It was a great and a fatal mistake. The best that now can be done is to retrace that erroneous step as rapidly as we can. Sir, this rebellion has been strengthened to an incalculable degree by the employment of negro soldiers. The policy, the system upon which the war has been conducted, has had no other effect than to unite and knit together the southern people firmly, indissolubly almost, and to call forth their utmost force and resources to the support of their rebellion. It has alarmed and deeply dissatisfied the loyal population of the border slave States, been a grievous injustice and oppression to that class of population in the rebel States, and caused everywhere oppressive measures that have produced wide-spread discontent in all the loyal States.

Sir, there was not a power necessary to have enabled the Government to subdue, in a reasonable time, this rebellion, that could not have been properly conferred upon it by constitutional legislation, and that would not have been literally in conformity to the Crittenden resolution and of the President's pledges in relation to the war.

But, sir, if the error, and, in my judgment, the fatal error, in enrolling negro soldiers is not to be retraced, we then come to that impregnable constitutional provision that private property, whether a slave or any other class of property, cannot be taken for the use of the Government without making the owner fair, just, and reasonable compensation. If the Senate should be indisposed to accept my first proposition, it ought at least to take the second. If it is resolved to have the military services of the negro, it must, in obedience to all the decisions of the Supreme Court, recognize the negro, where he is a slave, as property, and it must, in obedience to those decisions, as well as to the express provision of the Constitution, make provision for the payment of his fair value to the owner.

Mr. President, I will add one other word in connection with this branch of the subject. There are some gentlemen in this Chamber who were invited with other gentlemen, including myself, from the border slave States, to meet the President in consultation some two years ago in relation to this subject. On that occasion the President renewed his pledges, in the most explicit and clear language, that it was not his purpose to interfere with slavery in the States. He then admitted, in the most plain and distinct terms, that there were the same constitutional and legal guarantees to the owner of that property as to the owner of any other class of property. As I have stated before once or twice on this floor, he put this pointed case. "I," said the President, "earn $1,000, and I invest that money in land; another individual earns $1,000 and invests it in a negro slave; he has an indefeasible right to his slave as I have to my land."

He added furthermore, "I am not yet prepared to break with Greeley and company." A gentleman from Maryland suggested to him that the rights of the owners of that description of property were already being threatened to be infringed in that State. He then with emotion asseverated, "If I live until the 4th of March, 1865, I will remain President of the United States, and this property shall be protected in Maryland." A gentleman from that State then suggested to the President that the effect and substance of the conference between him and the gentlemen present should be reduced to writing. The President warmed up somewhat, and with some earnestness directed this question to that gentleman, "Do you see any of the snake in me?" I then thought that he had none of the snake in him, but how I have changed my opinion since! He was then dissembling; he has practiced the obliquity and crawling, stealthy movement of the snake towards its object upon the whole of the institution of slavery, though he then made professions so different to the gentlemen who surrounded him.

But, Mr. President, I have some authority here on the subject of property in slaves that I beg leave to lay before the Senate. Both the members from Massachusetts assume audaciously that there is not and cannot be property in negroes because they are human beings. Sir, Massachusetts herself has a history upon this subject, and I will read a little from that history. Let us see how Massachusetts used to think and to act and to trade and to legislate upon the subject of negro slavery and property in slaves. I ask those gentlemen when and where and by whom was negro slavery established in the American colonies—who but by Massachusetts herself? What does her history answer on these points of inquiry? A day of recent celebration of the sodality of "the New England Societies" at several points was signalized by this missile:

"The New England Society in the city of New York to the New England Society in Montreal, greeting: Thanks for your generous wishes. We shall not cease to labor for their complete fulfillment; and by the blessing of God, and our still victorious arms, we mean in our next anniversary, in all the States, from Maine to California, to celebrate the national jubilee in honor of the eternal principles of liberty under the law, which the Pilgrims, emerging from the cabin of the Mayflower, laid down as the corner-stone of the nation."

This promised glorification is not to be for the restored union of the States, the vindicated authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the return of peace and good-will to a torn and warring people, but for the violent and revolutionary overthrow of slavery in all the slave States, in disregard of constitutional guarantees and the sanction and protection of laws, by the victorious armies of the United States. I suppose that this grandiloquent piece of fustian and falsehood is the emanation of some half-crazed Massachusetts brain. Never was there a more impudent pharisaism uttered than that the eternal principles of liberty under the law were laid down as the corner-stone of the nation by the Pilgrims emerging from the cabin of the Mayflower. The persecutions of Roger Williams and his Anabaptist associates, and the cropping of the Friends, the burning of witches, the most vexatious and tyrannical body of laws and regulations extending to the minutæ of private and domestic life, and the long, habitual, and continuing disregard by Massachusetts of constitutions, laws, and treaties, all proclaim it to be untrue. Her early establishment by law of negro slavery, her enactment of the first and a vigorous fugitive slave law and slave code, declare its bold untruth.

The Mayflower landed her Pilgrims on Plymouth rock in 1620; and the Massachusetts Legislature, called "the General Court," in 1641, established this law:

"It is ordered by this court, and the authority thereof, that there shall never be any bond slavery, villinage, or captivity among us, unless it be lawful captives taken in just wars, as willingly sell themselves or are sold to us, and such shall have the liberties and Christian usages which the law of God established in Israel concerning such persons doth mortally require: Provided, That examples none from servitude who shall be adjudged thereto by authority."

On the 5th of September, 1672, "Articles of Confederation of the New England Colonies" were ordained at Plymouth. Section seven provides:

"It is also agreed if any servant run away from his master into any other of these confederated jurisdictions, that in such case, upon the certificate of one magistrate in the jurisdiction out of which said servant fled, or upon other due proof, the said servant shall be delivered to his master or any other that pursues and brings such certificate or proof."

Here was the first fugitive slave law of North America.

In 1683, the General Court passed a law concerning the right of men to sell themselves for debt; and providing that the court of the county should regulate the time of service, so that other creditors "should not be deprived of their fair share of the man's lifetime." As early as 1636, the General Court had declared that no "covenant servant in household with any other should hold office or vote."

In 1636, Massachusetts passed a law in relation to "covenant servants," the first section of which is:

"It is ordered that no servant shall be set free or have any lot until he have served out the time covenanted, under penalty of such fine as the quarter's court shall inflict, unless they see cause to remit the same."

This provision continued to be her law for upward of a century.

In June, 1703, she passed this law, from which it appears there were mulattoes in the land of the Pilgrim Fathers at a very early day as well as negro slaves:

An act relating to mulatto and negro slaves.

Whereas great charge and inconveniences have arisen to divers towns and places by the releasing and setting at liberty mulatto and negro slaves: For prevention whereof for the future,

Be it declared and enacted by his Excellency the Governor, Council, and Representatives, in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That no mulatto or negro slave shall hereafter be manumitted, discharged, or set free, until sufficient security be given to the treasurer of the town or place where such person dwells, in a valuable sum, not less than fifty pounds, to secure and indemnify the town or place from all charge for or about such mulatto or negro, to be manumitted and set at liberty, in case he or she by sickness, lameness, or otherwise, be rendered incapable to support him or herself.

We adopted that law in Kentucky pretty much in the same language and in essentially the same terms.

And no mulatto or negro hereafter manumitted shall be deemed or accounted free, for whom security shall not be given as aforesaid, but shall be the proper charge of their respective masters or mistresses, in case they stand in need of relief and support, notwithstanding any manumission or instrument of freedom to them made or given; and shall also be liable at all times to be put forth to service by the selectmen of the town.

In October of the same year Massachusetts passed this other law:

An act to prevent disorders in the night.

Whereas great disorders, insolences, and burglaries are oftentimes raised and committed in the night time by Indians, negro and mulatto servants and slaves, to the disquiet and hurt of her Majesty's good subjects: For the prevention thereof,

Be it enacted by his Excellency the Governor, Council, and Representatives, in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That no Indian, negro or mulatto servant or slave, may presume to be absent from the families whereto they respectively belong, or be found abroad in the night time after nine o'clock, unless it be upon some errand for their respective masters or owners. And all justices of the peace, constables, tithingmen, watchmen, and other her Majesty's good subjects, being householders within the same town, are hereby respectively empowered to take up and apprehend, or cause to be apprehended any Indian, negro or mulatto servant or slave that shall be found abroad after nine o'clock at night, and shall not give a good and satisfactory account of their business, make any disturbances or otherwise misbehave themselves, and forthwith convey them before the next justice of the peace, if it be not over late in the night, or to restrain them in the common prison, watch-house, or constable's house until the morning, and then cause them to appear before a justice of the peace, who shall order them to the house of correction to receive the discipline of the house, and then be dismissed; unless they be charged with any other offense than absence from the families whereto they respectively belong, without leave from their respective masters or owners; and in such towns where there is no house of correction, to be openly whipped by the constable, not exceeding ten stripes.

In 1718 she passed a law to punish any master of a vessel who should receive on board a hired servant without permission of his master, and making him also liable in damages to the "master or owner." Within twenty years after the landing of the Mayflower the Pilgrim Fathers passed a law of which section three reads:

"Sec. 3. It is also ordered that when any servants shall run away from their masters" * * * "It shall be lawful for the next magistrate, or the constable and two of the chief inhabitants, where no magistrate is, to press men and boats or pinnaces at the public charge to pursue such persons by sea and land, and bring them back by force of arms."

Such are the laws and usages of Massachusetts, which established, regulated, and gave security to slave property, and that seem to have been the models upon which the more southern slaveholding colonies fashioned their laws in relation to the same subject. But the Massachusetts system was the more atrocious in several features: it comprehended white men, Indians, negroes, and mulattoes. The title of the masters was by importation from foreign countries, captivity in war, and purchase. It established a servitude by the sale of himself of the white man, and forbade his enfranchisement by his master until his term had expired. It enacted an effective fugitive slave law for the white man, Indian, mulatto, and negro, servant and slave; and when they eloped from their "owners and masters," authorized their pursuit at the public charge, and upon a simple official certificate of their being slaves or servants, and directed them to be returned to their slavery or servitude. It required not the testimony of two witnesses and no sworn evidence whatever upon the point. It allowed no trial or examination before court or commissioner, no writ of habeas corpus, and no bail nor writ of replevin for the pursued fugitive; but its stern judgment was that he should go back into his former servitude or slavery. It punished the servant or slave, whether white, Indian, negro, or mulatto, male or female, with stripes, to be inflicted at the house of correction or publicly, for disorderly conduct or being from home after nine o'clock at night, unless on some special errand.

But, Mr. President, I now proceed to some of the minutæ of Massachusetts slavery, as established by her early history. I quote from the Historical Magazine:

"Hugh Peter writes to John Winthrop from Salem (in 1637)— only seventeen years after the landing of the Mayflower—

"Mr. Endecott and my selfe salute you in the Lord Jesus, &c. We have heard of a dividence of women and children in the bay and would be glad of a share, viz: a young woman or girl and a boy if you thinke good. I wrote to you for some boyes for Bermudas, which I think is considerable." (M. H. S. Coll., IV, vi, 95.)

In this application of Hugh Peter we have a glimpse of the beginning of the colonial slave trade.

He wanted "some boyes for the Bermudas," which he thought was "considerable."

It would seem to indicate that this disposition of captive Indian boys was in accordance with custom and previous practice of the authorities. At any rate, it is certain that in the Pequod war they took many prisoners. Some of those who had been "disposed of to particular persons in the country," (Winthrop, I, 232,) ran away, and being brought in again were "branded on the shoulder." (Ib.)

In May, 1637, Winthrop says:

"We had now slain and taken, in all, about seven hundred. We sent fifteen of the boys and two women to Bermuda by Mr. Peirce; but he, missing it, carried them to Providence Isle." (Winthrop, I, 234.)

The learned editor of Winthrop's Journal, referring to the fact that this proceeding in that day was probably justified by reference to the practice or institution of the Jews, very quaintly observes, "Yet that cruel people never sent prisoners so far." (Ib., note.)

A subsequent entry in Winthrop's journal gives us another glimpse of the subject, December 26, 1637:

"Mr. Peirce, in the Salem ship, the Desire, returned from the West Indies after seven months. He had been at Providence, and brought some cotton, and tobacco, and negroes, &c., from thence, and salt from Tertugos." (Ib., 254.)

Winthrop adds to this account that "dry fish and strong liquors are the only commodities for those parts. He met there two men-of-war, set forth by the lords, &c., of Providence with letters of mart, who had taken divers prizes from the Spaniard and many negroes." Long afterwards Dr. Belknap said of the slave trade that the rum distilled in Massachusetts was "the mainspring of this traffick." (M. H. S. Coll., I, iv, 197.)

Joselyn says, "That they sent the male children of the Pequots to the Bermudas." (258 M. H. S. Coll., IV, iii, 360.)

In the Pequod war, some of the Narragansetts joined the English in its prosecution, and received a part of the prisoners as slaves, for their services. Mantumomoh received eighty, Ninigret was to have twenty. (Drake, 122, 146. Mather's Relation, quoted by Drake, 39. See also Hartford Treaty, September 21, 1638, in Drake, 125.)

Captain Stoughton, who assisted in the work of exterminating the Pequots, after his arrival in the enemy's country, wrote to the Governor of Massachusetts [Winthrop] as follows: "By this pinnace, you shall receive forty-eight or fifty women and children." * * *

"Concerning which, there is one I formerly mentioned that is the fairest and largest that I saw amongst them, to whom I have given a coat to clothe her. It is my desire to have her for a servant, if it may stand with your good liking, else not."

I reckon that would have been the desire of the two Senators from Massachusetts if they had been there, especially of the gentleman who stands at the head of the Military Committee.

"There is a little squaw that Steward Calicut desired, to whom he hath given a coat. Lieut. Davenport also desired one, to wit, a small one, that hath three strokes upon her stomach, thus: — [11] —. He desired her, if it will stand with your liking. Sosonon, the Indian, desired a young little squaw, which I know not." (MS. Letter in Mass. Archives, quoted by Drake, 171.)

Probably if he had known her Sosonon would not have the privilege of getting her.

An early traveler in New England has preserved for us the record of one of the earliest, if not, indeed, the very first attempt at breeding of slaves in America. The following passage from Joselyn's Account of Two Voyages to New England, published at London in 1664, will explain itself:

"The Second of October, [1639] about 9 of the clock in the morning Mr. Mavericks' Negro woman came to my chamber window, and in her own Country language and tune sang very loud and shrill, going out to her, she used a great deal of respect towards me, and willingly would have expressed her grief in English; but I apprehended it by her countenance and deportment, whereupon I repaired to my host, to learn of him the cause, and resolved to intreat him in her behalf, for that I understood before, that she had been a Queen in her own Country, and observed a very humble and dutiful garb used towards her by another Negro who was her maid."

You see the term "negro" was used in that day. This fashionable shilly-shally language of "colored persons" and "descendant of Africa" was rather too circumlocutory, [laughter,] and they come out with the plain and direct term of "negro."

"Mr. Maverick was desirous to have a breed of Negroes, and therefore seeing she would not yield by persuasions to company with a Negro young man he had in his house; he commanded him witt's she witt's she to go to bed to her, which was no sooner done but she kicked him out again, this she took in high disdain beyond her slavery, and this was the cause of her grief." (Joselyn, 28.)

What a nice specimen of a Puritan "consecrated to human liberty" have we here!

Emanuel Downing, a lawyer of the Inner Temple, London, who married Lucy Winthrop, sister of the elder Winthrop, came over to New England in 1638. The editors of the Winthrop Papers say of him, "There were few more active or efficient friends of the Massachusetts Colony during its earliest and most critical period." His son was the famous Sir George Downing, English Ambassador at the Hague.

In a letter to his brother-in-law, "probably written during the summer of 1645," is a most luminous illustration of the views of that day and generation on the subject of human slavery. He says:

"A war with the Narragansett is verie considerable to this plantation, for I doubt whether yt be not synne in vs, having power in our hands, to suffer them to maynteyne the worship of the devil?"

Massachusetts-like. They wanted slaves then, and in order to make slaves of the Narragansetts, fanatical-like they took up the idea that they would make war because the Narragansetts worshiped the devil. I think Massachusetts has been guilty of a good deal of that sort of worship since. But to continue this extract:

"which their paw waves often doe; Alie, If upon a Just warre the Lord should deliver them into our hands, wee might easily have men, women and children enough to exchange for Moores, which wilbe more gaynefull pillidge for us than wee conceive, for I do not see how wee can thrive untill wee gett into a stock of slaves sufficient to doe all our business, for our children's children will hardly see this great Continent filled with people, soe that our servants will still desire freedom to plant for themselves, and not stay but for verie great wages. And I suppose you know verie well how wee shall maynteyne 20 Moores cheaper than one English servant."

A matter of domestic economy entered largely into the subject. They could make valuable exchanges of Indian captives for Moores, a sort of negroes, and this writer says that one white servant was more expensive to his master than twenty Moores.

"The ships that shall bring Moores may come home laden with salt which may beare most of the charge, if not all of yt. But I marvaile Connecticut should any wayes beare a warre without your helpe. (M. H. S. Coll., IV, vi, 65.) E. Y. E."

You see there the Massachusetts thrift. They wanted to put the whole cost of the voyage upon part of the cargo, so that the slaves they intended to purchase should not bear any portion of it.

It is thus shown that negro slavery was a Massachusetts institution. In the Convention which formed the Constitution, the committee of detail reported the form of one with this clause:

"No tax or duty shall be laid by the Legislature on articles exported from any State; nor on the migration or importation of such persons as the several States shall think proper to admit; nor shall such migration or importation be prohibited."

If that provision had been retained, or if one authorizing Congress to prohibit the slave trade had not been adopted, any State could have continued it indefinitely. The people of Massachusetts were at that time largely and profitably engaged in the slave trade to the southern States. Luther Martin, of Maryland, proposed to amend the section as reported, so as to allow a prohibition or tax on the importation of slaves to be imposed by Congress. The members from Massachusetts divided on this proposition of Luther Martin. That section, with others, was referred to a committee of eleven, but Massachusetts failed to vote on the motion to refer, and that committee reported in lieu of it a provision authorizing Congress to prohibit the slave trade after the beginning of the year 1800. Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, moved to strike out 1800 and insert 1808. That motion prevailed, Massachusetts voting in favor of it; and thus by her position the slave trade would have been allowed to continue in perpetuity; but other States controlling her on that point, she was enabled to procure a continuance of it for twenty years longer. She, and all the States, voted for the provision authorizing the rendition of fugitive slaves. To that, which she now opposes with frenzied passion, there was no objection in the Convention. Her course is explained by the fact that the slave trade was her trade. She furnished the ships and sailors that visited the slave marts on the African coast and purchased negro captives from their savage conquerors for rum and trinkets, and carried them to the southern States and sold them for enriching prices in gold. She voted to continue her trade in slaves.

If Massachusetts had been situated in the low latitudes, and her soil had been rich, inexhaustible alluvion, producing cotton, sugar, and rice, who doubts that she would have been heavily peopled with African slaves, that she would now have held and would continue to hold on to them with the firm grip which has ever characterized the spirit of her all-covetousness, that she would to this day have been intensely pro-slavery; and that her two Senators, if under that state of things they could have got to the Senate, would be her most faithful representatives; and that she and they would now be resisting vehemently and obstinately such assaults upon the institution as they are making upon it? Massachusetts has always been active, energetic, alert, inventive, intellectual, avaricious, intermeddling, fanatical, and domineering; but her love of acquisition has ever been and still is her master passion. She continued illicitly the slave trade after the law of Congress prohibiting it went into operation, and when it was finally broken up by the combined action of Congress, courts, and cruisers, and could no longer minister to her rapacity by the smuggling of slaves into the southern States her more subordinate characteristics, fanaticism and meddlesomeness, began to spring up, and after a while became dominant. She conceived the project of robbing the people of the southern States of the slaves that she had carried and sold to them for money. In the name of a spurious philanthropy she commenced to agitate in every form most indus- triously and intensely to destroy that property, not in Cuba and Brazil, but among her own countrymen and customers, and set up her impudent and absurd "higher law" conceits to break down the constitutional and legal guarantees with which it had been so long environed, and which she contributed so much to build up. She inaugurated not only in her own borders, but in every locality to which her people could gain access, a general system of talking, lecturing, declaiming, and preaching against the "greater crime of slavery," publishing newspapers, tracts, novels, essays, books, and pictures, all fraught with the basest falsehoods and slanders against and slave-owners, and rendering and intending to render it abhorrent to the northern people.

Massachusetts thus estranged, divided, and exasperated the people of the free and slave States. She, with malice aforethought, schooled them to hate each other with a diabolical purpose of sundering the Union and subverting the Constitution because of the protection which it gave to the owners of slaves. She complained that the freedom of speech and of the press and her rights were violated because the slave States would not open their bosom to her nefarious agitation of that property, and of the right upon which it was founded. Let us look at her deliberate resolves.

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, this is a pretty good stopping place.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to move an adjournment; but before doing so, I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 41, to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, with a view to make it the special order for Thursday next, at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be entertained by the unanimous consent of the Senate. If there be no objection, that will be regarded as the sense of the Senate, and that bill will be assigned for Thursday next, at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour. The question now is on an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the annual report on commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending September 30, 1863.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That four thousand additional copies of the report on commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending September 30, 1863, be printed in quarto form for the use of the House; and also one thousand copies for the use of the State Department.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I hope that these commercial relations will be correctly printed. They were very incorrectly printed last year. I hope that great care will be taken in reproducing the tables in print.

PERMISSION TO RECORD VOTES.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask unanimous consent of the House to record my vote on the twenty-second and twenty-fifth amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the conscription bill. I came in after my name had been called.

Mr. STILES. I shall not object if I am allowed to record my vote on the joint resolution amendatory of the confiscation act.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am willing to do all I can to enable the gentleman to get his vote recorded.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOMALL voted in favor of the amendments indicated; and Mr. STILES voted against the joint resolution amendatory of the confiscation act.

Mr. SWEAT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to record my vote against the same joint resolution.

There was no objection, and the vote was recorded accordingly.

ARKANSAS CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise for the purpose of calling up the case of James M. Johnson, claiming to be a Representative to this House from the second congressional district of Arkansas, in order that his credentials may be referred to the Committee of Elections. When I offered them the other day the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] moved that they be laid upon the table. I hope that he will withdraw that motion for a moment, so that I may make a statement.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I had no personal acquaintance with the gentleman who brought to me these credentials and asked me to present them. He came to me with a letter of introduction from the commanding general of that department, General Steele, through his brother, the distinguished member from New York. From his statements and from what I learned elsewhere I found these to be the facts: the gentleman himself, his brother, and brother-in-law, the present provisional Governor of Arkansas under the new constitution lately adopted, were residents of the same town in this congressional district, and in the first month of the war, in 1861, they were driven from the State and from their homes by the rebels because of the course they took at the threshold against the rebellion. From that moment they entered into the Union armies. This gentleman has served in those armies, and in many battles of the Southwest he has had the honor, as a colonel of one of the Union regiments of Arkansas, to distinguish himself. He holds a commission in that capacity at this moment. While he was absent in the Army, never being able to set his foot in his own State except at the head of the forces of the Union, the loyal people of the State of Arkansas met in convention and adopted a State constitution, and sent him here as the bearer of the constitution of a free State, the first unwilling fruit which this rebellion has borne. In his absence and without his knowledge the voters of the second congressional district of Arkansas, numbering four or five thousand, elected him as their Representative upon this floor. He offers his credentials through the ordinary channels of the House, and though he has had the honor of bearing here the first free-State constitution out of the fire and smoke of this war, and though he comes here, covered with honorable scars won in defense of the flag of his country, with a commission as a Representative elect to this House, he is denied so much as a hearing.

The gentleman from Maryland does the unusual thing of moving to lay his credentials upon the table rather than they shall be even referred, as all others are by the rules, to the Committee of Elections. The Committee of Elections will be quite willing to be relieved of this additional labor. They are quite sufficiently borne down with work already. But as one of that committee, and as a member of this House, I never will consent, without opening my mouth in protest against it, that any man, however humble he may be, shall be denied a hearing when he comes here with his petition for a seat; much less a man coming here under these circumstances and with the testimonials of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, whether the State of Arkansas has been distrusted.

Mr. DAWES. The State of Arkansas was distrusted according to the law of the United States before the rebellion broke out; and it was divided into three congressional districts according to the number assigned by the last census.

I know not whether upon an investigation by the Committee of Elections there will be sufficient law or sufficient facts to justify the admission of this gentleman to a seat upon the floor as a Representative from Arkansas. It is because I want to know whether there is law or constituency enough to justify us in admitting him here that I move that these credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections.

But, sir, I will not say to him, to the men whom he represents, to the State of Arkansas, to the loyal men in the State of Arkansas who have staked all and sacrificed all, and lost all but honor in the defense of the flag upon the outposts and front of this rebellion—I say I will not turn round and say to them here in my seat that this man is an alien enemy. Of course I have no war with the gentleman from Maryland, and with his conviction of what is his duty I make no complaint, but I trust he may see proper, in the line of his duty, to withdraw his motion to lay these papers upon the table, and allow the Committee of Elections to examine them.

The Committee of Elections have taken such action and made such reports to this House that their opinions upon kindred subjects are quite well known to the House, and if the House has not confidence in them in consequence of their known convictions upon these questions, or in consequence of their want of fidelity to their duties and want of industry, it is quite proper for the House to refuse to refer the credentials of claimants to this committee. But unless they have such a charge to bring against the committee, I trust no such reflection will be cast upon them by not permitting even the credentials of a member, coming here and applying for a seat, to be referred to the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, obtained the floor. Mr. STEELE, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I simply wish to say, inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee of Elections has referred to me, that I did receive from General Steele a letter of introduction brought to me by Mr. Johnson, and at the request of Mr. Johnson I introduced him to the chairman of the Committee of Elections. Mr. Johnson came to Little Rock during the time the convention was there in session, while on his way to present his credentials to this House. He was requested by that convention to remain there until the convention adjourned. He did so, and was made by that convention a bearer of dispatches to the President of the United States. And I think that circumstance of itself indicates that that highly respectable body of men desired at least to give him their indorsement.

I know nothing about the merits of this matter. I only know that this man comes here in this way, vouched here as a highly respectable gentleman; and I do hope this House will extend to him the same courtesy of having his credentials examined by the proper committee that is extended to every other man claiming a seat here.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, if it were a question of confidence in the Committee of Elections, there is no gentleman in this House who would more cheerfully yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If it were a question of respect for the gentleman from Arkansas, whose credentials are offered to the House, the testimonies which have been rendered this morning would make me withdraw my motion. It was not made, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of raising an issue with the gentleman from Massachusetts, still less for the purpose of exhibiting an illiberal spirit toward the gentleman from Arkansas. It was because I supposed, as now it turns out to be the fact, that it is not a mere question of election law which would be involved, but a question of the recognition or refusal to recognize the organization of a State government in Arkansas. That question I am not willing to have passed upon on the collateral matter of the investigation of the right of a gentleman to a seat upon this floor.

If the gentleman at the head of the Committee of Elections should move this House that the subject should be referred to him to consider whether there exists a State government of the State of Arkansas, making it a direct and substantive topic of examination, nobody would more cheerfully acquiesce in a motion of that kind than I, nor could a more appropriate gentleman be found in the House to preside over such an investigation than my friend from Massachusetts. But when the gentleman presents credentials of a gentleman claiming to be a Representative from the State of Arkansas, and these credentials do not appear to be signed by any officer of any State government known to the United States, nor to be issued under any law known to us of any State in the United States, I desire to say that the reference of those credentials to a committee carries with it an implication that it is possible that, under existing circumstances, he can be a Representative from the State of Arkansas. That implication I am not willing to allow to pass without bringing it directly to the notice of the House.

The Constitution of the United States says that the qualifications of electors for the election of members of this House shall be the same as those of electors for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Until there be a State Legislature recognized by the United States there can be no electors entitled to vote for any members to this House, and if there be no electors entitled to vote there can be no members elected to this House. Is there, then, any Legislature in the State of Arkansas, now actually existing, recognized by any authority of the United States? There is one legislature of Arkansas carried down into the southeastern corner of the State, swaying about one third of the State, which legislature does not recognize the Constitution or authority of the United States. Do the United States recognize that legislature? Does the gentleman whose credentials are presented profess to represent the State of which that body is the legislature? Are we to understand that a Representative is here from a State whose legislature repudiates the authority of the Constitution of the United States, and which is not recognized by the President or by either House of Congress? If so, that disposes of the whole question. If he do not profess to come here under the authority of the laws of that legislature, which we say is a body usurping the authority of the United States and merely a collection of rebels, having no legal authority, if he do not come from the State which that legislature recognizes, then what other State government exists there? This House has heard of none in any authentic shape. The President has communicated none to this House. The Senate has had no such State government brought to its notice. We have had no such State government brought before us. There is, therefore, no State government in the State of Arkansas recognized by the laws of the United States and that appears to this House in intentment of law or in point of fact. That being the case, sir, when credentials are presented and laid on the table they come from no authority that anybody recognizes; and to accept those credentials, to make them the subject of any reference, is an assumption of the existence of a State government recognized by the United States, which is not true in point of fact.

Now, if it be true, as we have been told this morning by my friend from Massachusetts who is at the head of the Committee of Elections, that there has been an election, that a constitution has been formed, that a State government has been inaugurated, let us have proofs of those facts, and let there be a direct vote of the House of Representatives to say whether they will recognize as a government this thing organized without any authority of law, without the supervision of any official authority, organized merely under the dictation of a military commander, and organized, therefore, without authority of law; we know not with what fairness; we know not according to what rules of election; we know not by what constituencies; we know not by what proportion of the people of Arkansas. Let us inquire directly into these facts, and if they are satisfactory to us let us accept that government, and then we will be in a condition to consider the credentials of the gentleman from Arkansas. But until we have done this thing we have not the essential conditions preliminary to the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understood that the object of the gentleman from Maryland in moving to lay the credentials on the table was to prevent examination being made into this matter. Now I want to know whether, if these credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections, as they can be under the rules of the House, that committee would not be authorized and required to take jurisdiction of the whole subject and report to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Why, sir, certainly not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know why.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Palpably, not.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I will have the rule read.

The Clerk read the 75th rule, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials, of the members returned to serve in this House; and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question, and be referred to them by the House."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Assuredly, Mr. Speaker; but was ever, in the history of the United States Congress, the question of the existence of a State government anywhere made to depend on the subordinate question of the right of a member to a seat in this House? It is inverting all the proportions of the matter. The admission, undoubtedly, of a member of the House presupposes the existence of the State. But does the House treat that as a matter of so little moment as to have it decided incidentally by the Committee of Elections, instead of having the matter directly referred to a committee and fully examined? Is it a question of electoral laws? When a gentleman has been elected to a seat in Congress, the condition precedent to his election is the important political fact of the recognizing of the State government.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to go a step further. If we recognize a government in Arkansas and the President refuse to recognize it, in what condition are we? If the Senate recognize a government and we fail to recognize it here, in what condition are we? Or, to take the other case, if the President, under the pledge given in his proclamation of the 8th December, 1863, shall see fit to repeal this act of military organization of a State government, and shall see fit to recognize it as the government of a State, and to treat it as entitled to the guarantee of the United States, and if this House or both Houses of Congress refuse to recognize it, where are we? Can there be a recognition of a State government which does not unite the suffrages of all three political departments?

In the course of next February, the seat which you, sir, now occupy will be occupied by the Vice President, and we will be compelled to count the electoral vote for President and Vice President of the United States. Suppose a State Government be recognized by one branch of Congress and not recognized by the other, or be recognized by the President and not recognized by Congress; and suppose the electoral vote presented from that State should determine the presidential election, who will decide that political question? Yet that question is involved here, as the mere incident to the right of a gentleman to a seat on this floor.

If we are willing to say that State governments exist in all the rebel States, though the war is waged against us by their authority, then we take one view of the subject. But if the States have ceased to exist, if the fact of their rebellion has destroyed their relation to the United States governments, if we have to recognize new governments, that is a political question to be determined by the President, by the House of Representatives, and by the Senate of the United States. Neither one of the three nor any two of the three can determine it. It leads to the gravest political questions. It will bring us, if we venture on this collateral and incidental mode of determining this grave question, very probably within the range of a civil war for the presidency, superadded to the pending civil war for the integrity of the Republic. It was because I saw these consequences involved that I moved to lay these papers on the table. It was because the President has called on General Banks to organize another hermaphrodite government, half military, half republican, representing the alligators and the frogs of Louisiana, and to place that upon the footing of a government of a State of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. With great pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland, if he denies that the Committee of Elections has the right to examine and report whether there be a Legislature in the State of Arkansas qualified to fix the qualifications of electors for members of Congress, what right has he to assume, and act upon the assumption, that there is no Legislature there? Where does he get his own information, and how is the House informed on that subject?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My opinion is exactly that of the gentleman and every one in the House. We know in point of law that there is no government there, just as we recognize the great seal of Arkansas when there is one. We recognize the counterfeit, and know it to be one. We know that Arkansas has thrown off allegiance. We know that she defies the authority of the United States, and resigns all possible State government. We know that we have recognized none, and there is none.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman from Maryland assert in his opinion that the State government is destroyed in Arkansas; that she is obliterated as a State; that she is no longer one of the States of the Union; and that she must come back into the family of States upon application, just as a State comes in from a Territory?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will answer the gentleman. Does the gentleman recognize the constitution under which this gentleman comes here as the constitution of Arkansas?

Mr. MALLORY. I want to know something about that constitution from the Committee of Elections. I want to know all about it, and then I am ready to act. When I have the report of the able Committee of Elections, over which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] presides, I shall be better able to answer these questions. So much for that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask my friend from Kentucky to give me a correct and candid answer. He knows as well as I do that this constitution and form of government brought here as the basis to allow this gentleman to enter this House upon were made within a month. Does he recognize that himself as the government of Arkansas?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I do not like the Yankee mode of proceeding which the gentleman adopts on this occasion of answering one question by asking another. He has not answered the question I put to him, and I do not think it is fair for him to ask me one until he has answered the one I put to him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will answer the gentleman's question. I am not anxious in the least degree to avoid it.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the State of Arkansas is not extinguished. I think that no citizen of Arkansas has lost any personal privilege of citizenship; nor have they withdrawn from any responsibility to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY rose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Allow me to answer the question.

A State should exist with a government. The Constitution of the United States assumes that when it compels Congress to guaranty a government. The Supreme Court of the United States assumed that, when, in the case of Fisher and Walton, they said if a military government be established in a State it would be the duty of the United States to abrogate and remove it. The rebel government in Arkansas is a military government, and therefore not a republican government, and the United States is now engaged in removing it. When it is removed there will be no government in point of fact, as there is none in point of law. To-day the condition of Arkansas I take to be this: her political privileges depend upon her organization of a State government, and not upon the fact of her being a State. Without her Legislature there are no electors; there is nobody entitled under the Constitution of the United States to vote for members of Congress. She is in the condition where Tennessee was under the administration, I believe, of General Washington. Tennessee was admitted into the Union without the scratch of the pen of a constitution. It was a State without a State government. When Tennessee organized her State government, that was recognized by Congress. When Arkansas shall organize a State government, that will be recognized by Congress and the President. Until that condition precedent representation upon this floor does not exist. A man may live, but without arms he cannot well work; without legs he cannot well walk. The substance of the man is there, but the faculty of action is gone. It is the paralyzed condition in which the rebel States now exist.

Mr. MALLORY. Can he live without brains?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir, not without brains; and we think Arkansas has the brains, but her hands and arms are tied by the rebellion, and we are going to loose them.

Mr. STEVENS. Arkansas is now under a military governor, and I want to know whether any State under the authority of a military governor and general can enact any civil laws which will be binding. And I refer in this connection to California, in reference to which it was decided by the Supreme Court that while the military law existed the military governor and general could authorize no civil law, and that therefore the law in reference to revenue was void.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I take it there is no authority to pass any law in Arkansas at this time for anybody; and that any government there not recognized by the United States is a usurpation against authority. The government of California was the government of a foreign territory, directly recognized, without any intermediate territorial existence at all. The State of Texas was a foreign State, recognized without any intermediate territorial government at all. But the State of Texas was no more entitled to representation here until we saw fit to recognize her representatives and herself as a State than is the State of Arkansas at this time to representation here.

Now, having answered my friend with all the distinctness possible, I ask him whether he recognizes as the existing government of the State of Arkansas that government under which the gentleman from Arkansas here claims a seat.

Mr. MALLORY. I recognize the existing constitution which forms the government of Arkansas as the government for that State now; and whenever under that government the people of Arkansas choose to send a Representative to this House, claiming that he is their Representative, if I have any doubt upon the subject whether he is such or not, I would refer his claim to the Committee of Elections to have it decided.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Still the gentleman has not answered my question; but of course I have no right to press it.

I merely wish to make this observation, that the gentleman labors under the same confusion of ideas which seems to pervade all the gentlemen upon this floor in that respect. They suppose that a constitution, written on paper, laid away in the archives, with no organization to put it in force, is the government. The constitution is the form prescribed; the government is the body of men in whom it is vested, by whom it acts, through whom it lives, whom we recognize; and the constitution of Arkansas is now, by the mere effect of the rebellion, absolutely dead and incapable of revival except by a revolutionary process.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maryland that I do not regard the constitution of Arkansas as the government of Arkansas; but I regard the constitution as the organic law which forms the government and gives it power. I had supposed that was the opinion of the gentleman from Maryland. I had supposed the gentleman concurred with me in the opinion that the Constitution of the United States is the organic law which gives power to the Government of the United States. I think that was once his opinion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I am not aware that I have changed any opinion upon the subject of the Constitution of the United States that I ever entertained. On the contrary, I have entertained the opinion, and entertain it now, that the solution of this great social struggle, and the solution of the question of the reestablishment of State governments in the States where rebellion exists, is under that great law of the Constitution which says the United States shall guaranty—not may—but shall guaranty a republican form of government in every State. It is their duty, not merely their right, to do so. They are bound to see that it is not merely a mushroom growth under the dictation of a military commander or the President's proclamation.

Mr. MALLORY. I concur in that most fully.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. And in reference to the old constitution of Arkansas, which they destroyed when they rebelled, that has ceased to be their government. They have no republican government there; and the papers read here, no matter by whom made, or how, or under what auspices, are nothing until we have examined and ascertained that they are proper ones.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a single question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. With great pleasure.

Mr. HARDING. I propound this question to the gentleman, whether, in his judgment, the State of Arkansas is in or out of the Union? I want a direct answer.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will not follow the example of my other friend from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] by evading it, but I will say that, in my judgment, it is in the Union; in the Union so far that we are bound to see that nothing which has the form without the substance of a government shall control her citizens; so far in the Union that we are responsible that she shall be governed according to republican laws; so far in the Union that the loyal men of Arkansas cannot be governed by traitors who call themselves the Legislature of Arkansas. We are bound to protect them. It is not merely our right, it is our bounden and highest duty; and it is for that reason and under these grave responsibilities—and not for the purpose of making an issue with my friend from Massachusetts, for whom no one in this House has a greater respect or a kinder regard than I have—that I thought I would present this grave question which rests upon our consciences as one which ought not to be passed upon as a secondary and incidental issue in an election case.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland whether by the motion he has made he intends to commit this House, if his motion shall prevail, to the doctrine that the claims of this gentleman are not some time to be considered?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir. I do not know, nor do I pretend to know what his claim may be. If the people of Arkansas have taken steps to organize a government, and upon investigation we shall be satisfied that what they have done fairly represents the masses of the people of Arkansas; if we shall be satisfied that the thing called a government is one to which we can intrust the interests of the people of Arkansas; if it is such an organization that we feel ourselves entitled to say, "Men of Arkansas, you shall obey it, obey it under all the responsibilities of the United States Government, and if you revolt against it we will compel you to submit to it," for that is the grave aspect of the question; if we shall be of opinion that the government so organized is one which we can say shall be obeyed and which we are ready to commit ourselves to enforce compulsory obedience to, then I will consider the questions of election law involved in this case. But it must be done not by this House alone; it must not be done by the Senate alone; it must be done not under the proclamation of the President, which, so far as it is anything more than a State paper, is a grave usurpation upon the legislative authority of the people of the United States; it must be done by the concurrence of the legislative and executive powers, and without that it is nothing.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Pardon me a moment. I wish to say that, understanding as I do from the remark of the gentleman from Maryland that he intends by his motion only to lay these credentials upon the table until the great question as to the political condition of Arkansas is settled, I concur entirely in the wisdom of his proposition.

I think it would be a most unfortunate thing for this country, and of course most unwise, for this House, by its action upon an incidental matter, to settle the condition of the State of Arkansas, or of any other State.

But I cannot concur with the gentleman from Maryland in the suggestion I understood him to make as to the lack of good faith on the part of the President or on the part of General Banks, both of whom I believe are acting, with regard to the State of Louisiana, and I have no doubt that the President is also so acting with reference to Arkansas, with the most patriotic intentions.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My friend misunderstood me. I do not in the least degree cast any imputation upon the faith of the President. I impeach very seriously the legality of his proclamation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not propose to discuss its legality, but I have a settled conviction that this nation in its present condition ought, before it, by any process, either executive, legislative, or judicial, recognizes the existence of these rebel States, to canvass the whole question. The right of this gentleman, if he has any legal right, to a seat upon this floor, is a very subordinate and unimportant claim as compared with the right of the loyal people and the loyal States of this Union to know, first of all, and upon most substantial and thorough investigation, whether Arkansas is a State in this Union. I have examined this matter as much as I was able, from the commencement of the contest till now, and I have the settled conviction that the State of Arkansas and the other ten cooperating States in this rebellion have no legal or constitutional existence as States of this Union.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the question when those States ceased to exist. Was it on the passage of the secession ordinance? If not, I should like to know at what point of time they ceased to exist and got out of the Union.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will state my own views in my own way, and as I go on I shall answer the inquiry of the gentleman from New York. The foundation of my whole theory is in this political proposition, that on this continent neither a colony nor a State has ever existed except by the will of the people within its limits. From that proposition I infer another, which is that no State can cease to exist as a State except by the will of the people within its limits. If you deny the constitutional power of the people to annul their existence as a State, as a political organization, you have to admit that, whatever may be the constitutional right or absence of right, the fact still is that the power is in the people of a State to declare whether they will exist or not; and there is neither power under the Constitution, there is neither force in the nation, there is neither power in the universe, in the absence of divine interference, to create the State of Arkansas and compel her to take her place in this Union, to send members to this House and Senators to the other branch of Congress, except with the consent and will of the people themselves. We have before us this great fact that for nearly three years past Arkansas has declared, in the presence of the world and in the most formal manner known to human proceedings, that, as a State, she has ceased to exist in the American Union.

Mr. GANSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No; I think I will go on. The State has ceased to exist. Call it suicide if you may; but though it be suicide it is none the less a fact. You search human and divine laws in vain for authority that an individual may take his own life. All law is against it. But when an individual commits the act of self-destruction, when his lifeless body lies before you, it is in vain that you reason on law, and say that he had no right to do the deed. He has ceased to exist by his own will. The State of Arkansas, by the will of its people, expressed in some way or other, but according to the form which has had potency and effect during these three years, has ceased to exist as a State of the American Union.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to ask him a question. He says that the State of Arkansas has, by the will of her own people, ceased to exist. Have not all the States of the Union some interest in that question as well as the people of Arkansas?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I answer yes.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Have not the people of the Union such an interest in that direction as to prevent even the majority of the people of Arkansas from taking out of the State?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman asks me whether there is a power in this country—

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I do not mean the power; I mean the right.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman asks me whether there be the right in this country to prevent the people of Arkansas going out of the Union I say yes; but if he asks me whether there be any constitutional power by which we can prevent the people of Arkansas from declaring that their State organization has ceased to exist I say no. That is a matter within their own control as a fact; and you cannot escape from a fact whatever your reasons and theories may be. By the voice of the people of Arkansas their State organization has ceased to exist. What remains? The jurisdiction of the General Government under the Constitution over the territory of Arkansas exists unimpaired, exactly as it was before this so-called ordinance of secession was passed. What more remains? Jurisdiction and sovereignty over the people of the State of Arkansas, neither more nor less than it was before the act of secession was passed. What is the condition of the people of Arkansas? Speaking legally and also as a matter of fact, they have just those rights which they can enjoy without a State organization. Of what, then, are they deprived? Of those privileges under the Constitution of the United States which can be enjoyed only through a State organization.

Now what remains for us to do? To wait till the people of Arkansas, "clothed and in their right mind," without the exercise of military force, without coercion, by numbers so great as to give assurance that they will remain loyal to the Union, shall appear before the legislative and executive departments of the Government, and ask to be replaced as a State with a constitution, and admitted to all the rights of the several States of this Union.

There are six essential conditions to the existence of a State as a State of the American Union:

1. Territory or area within the jurisdiction of the United States.
2. Inhabitants.
3. A constitution or organic law in which the existence of the Constitution of the United States is recognized, and its supremacy in certain particulars declared or admitted.
4. Officers of the State appointed or elected and sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, as required by that Constitution, (Article VI.)
5. Admission into the Union.
6. Senators and Representatives appointed or elected to the Congress of the United States.

The third, fourth, and sixth of these conditions are wanting in the case of Arkansas and the other States engaged in the present rebellion, and have been so wanting for three years.

I think that it is a subordinate and unimportant question as to who shall come from Arkansas to represent her upon this floor until we can settle the great question of the right of Arkansas to a State government as a State of this Union. I am, for one, for waiting to give my affirmative vote until a majority of her loyal people shall frame a constitution guaranteeing full and exact justice to all men, black and white. I will wait until we can be satisfied in all particulars that the people of that State will be loyal to the national Government.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me a resolution which I intended to present to the House in the ordinary way, but I now ask to have it read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the rebellious States be instructed to consider and report upon the expediency of recommending to this House the adoption of the following Declaration of Opinions.

In view of the present condition of the country, and especially in view of the recent signal successes of the national arms, promising a speedy overthrow of the rebellion, this House makes the following declaration of opinions concerning the institution of slavery in the States and parts of States engaged in the rebellion, and embraced in the proclamation of emancipation issued by the President on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1863; and also concerning the relations now subsisting between the people of such States and parts of States on the one side and the American Union on the other.

It is therefore declared, (as the opinion of the House of Representatives,) That the institution of slavery was the cause of the present rebellion, and that the destruction of slavery in the rebellious States is an efficient means of weakening the power of the rebels; that the President's proclamation, whereby all persons heretofore held as slaves in such States and parts of States have been declared free, has had the effect to increase the power of the Union and to diminish the power of its enemies; that the freedom of such persons was desirable and just in itself, and an efficient means by which the Government was to be maintained and its authority reestablished in all the territory and over all the people within the legal jurisdiction of the United States; that it is the duty of the Government and of loyal men everywhere to do what may be practicable for the enforcement of the proclamation, in order to secure in fact as well as by the forms of law the extinction of slavery in such States and parts of States; and finally, that it is the paramount duty of the Government and of all loyal men to labor for the restoration of the American Union upon the basis of freedom.

And this House does further declare, That a State can exist or cease to exist only by the will of the people within its limits, and that it cannot be created or destroyed by the external force or opinion of other States, or even by the judgment or action of the nation itself; that a State when created by the will of its people can become a member of the American Union only by its own organized action and the concurrent action of the existing national Government; that when a State has been admitted to the Union, no vote, resolution, ordinance, or proceeding, on its part, however formal in character or vigorously sustained, can deprive the national Government of the legal jurisdiction and sovereignty over the territory and people of such State which existed previous to the act of admission, or which were acquired thereby; that the effect of the so-called acts, resolutions, and ordinances of secession adopted by the eleven States engaged in the present rebellion is, and can only be, to destroy those political organizations as States, while the legal and constitutional jurisdiction and authority of the national Government over the people and territory remain unimpaired; that these several communities can be organized into States only by the will of the loyal people expressed freely and in the absence of all coercion; that States so organized can become States of the American Union only when they shall have applied for admission and their admission shall have been authorized by the existing national Government; that when a people have organized a State upon the basis of allegiance to the Union and applied for admission, the character of the institutions of such proposed State may constitute a sufficient justification for granting or rejecting such application; and inasmuch as experience has shown that the existence of human slavery is incompatible with a republican form of government in the several States or in the United States, and inconsistent with the peace, prosperity, and unity of the nation, it is the duty of the people and of all men in authority to resist the admission of slave States wherever organized within the jurisdiction of the national Government.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a few words. I agree in that part of this resolution which says that it is the duty of loyal men to strive to preserve and restore this Union; and my only object in asking to say a word is to appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and others, whether they believe, or whether the members of this House believe, we are, as the representatives of the people now involved in these terrible difficulties and this great struggle, whether we are doing anything which tends to the preservation or the restoration of this Union, when we are spending day after day and hour after hour in discussing questions which can be postponed, and when questions are pressing upon us which threaten the destruction of the Government and the ruin of this people? Now, sir, nearly three months have passed, and no bill has yet been considered to strengthen the credit of the Government; and any man who knows anything must know that it is in danger of breaking down daily and bringing ruin upon our cause and country for want of proper legislation to strengthen our credit and enhance our finances. We have spent months here uselessly. The other House spent two months, or the greater part of two months, in discussing the amendments to the enrollment bill before they came to an agreement. There being no opposition to what they did, the House, or a majority of the House who believed in it, passed the bill speedily, without much discussion on either side compared with the Senate; and the reason was put forth that there was no time for long discussion, and the necessities of the country were great. That bill has been returned rejected by the Senate, or returned to us with the amendments of the House non-concurred in. It lies here; yet we can take hour after hour in discussing these mere resolutions on abstract questions, which must tend to divide the people of the loyal States, and which tend to the detriment of the Government and not to its benefit. It seems to me that those of us who have the desire to save the country should engage our time with practical questions and not with resolutions on abstractions upon which men may well differ. I submit to a majority of the House if we are to have these propositions, let us not have them in the form of crude resolutions expressing the opinion of one man, but let them come in from the regular committee, and let us discuss them if they are to be discussed. But let us first pass upon practical questions which are pressing upon us, and which are important, if we mean to strengthen the Government in the prosecution of this war. In the name of all that is good, let us first address ourselves to the question of how we shall best enforce the Constitution before we embark on the wide sea of resolutions of what we will do in reference to questions that well may be postponed.

I suggest to this House earnestly, therefore, that there are practical questions before us; that there is some importance to be attached to trying to preserve this Government for white men as well as for black men. Let us not, then, spend all our time upon one subject, when every man knows we are endangering the liberties, the rights, and the Government of the country, and are doing no practical good to the unfortunate black man, who is being ground to powder under these circumstances.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he voted for the passage of the enrollment bill?

Mr. KERNAN. No, sir; I, like the Senate, rejected that bill. But there is nothing improper in that. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing that bill at the time it was under discussion. I proposed a few amendments which we thought wise. But they were voted down, and I have nothing to say. I recognized the fact that that was the policy of a majority of the House, and we did not propose to embarrass them. What I complain of is, that while it is their policy, while they would not give us time to discuss it because they deemed it so important, there is never a want of time to discuss a crowd of resolutions as to what will happen when we put down the rebellion—if we put it down.

Mr. SCHENCK. (interrupting.) I have been watching all the morning for an opportunity to make a proposition to the House, and I think this is a good opportunity. I ask the consent of the House to introduce a motion that the House insist upon its amendments to the Senate enrollment bill, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. KERNAN. I yield with the greatest pleasure to anything of that kind.

Mr. COX. I object. I want it to come up in its order.

Mr. SCHENCK. And I wish it understood that my colleague objects.

Mr. COX. I object because I do not know what the amendments of the Senate are.

Mr. SCHENCK. I can inform the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman should not impugn me in that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the Senate merely non-concurred in all the House amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Senate non-concurred in everything we did, and therefore we ask a committee of conference.

Mr. COX. I prefer that the House shall proceed in the regular way; and therefore I keep my objection standing.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. If we—and I address that to myself as well as to everybody else—will turn our attention to necessary, practical legislation, and show the country that we are earnest in doing what the majority think should be done for sustaining the Government; if we postpone those theoretical questions which can do no good and may do harm, referring this question to the Committee of Elections, and allowing other questions which gentlemen are thrusting in by their resolutions to await their time, the country will be satisfied, and we can get through our business and adjourn early in April, and do more good for the country than if we sat here until July discussing humbug resolutions.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to make a short statement in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York; it is that while he is now appealing to the majority of the House to proceed with legitimate business and the practical legislation of the country, that side of the House for two long weeks prevented the action of the House upon the confiscation resolution. They insisted upon debating it, and thereby lost two weeks' time.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I submit to him that his charge is a most unjust one, when his own side of the House, upon a bare statement of a minority of the committee, said the resolution must be discussed. We only asked for a fair discussion.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ARKANSAS REPRESENTATION—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to what the gentleman from New York has said I wish to say—and the House will bear me out in the facts—that on two several occasions I appealed to that side of the House to fix a time for taking the vote upon that measure. I asked them to have it disposed of in order that the legitimate business of the House might go on and that other committees might submit their reports. The objection, as I have said, came from that side of the House. This side of the House, when I first asked that a time should be fixed for disposing of the resolution, had agreed upon what they would support and were ready to take a vote, but we were notified by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that they would resort to all the parliamentary proceedings and all the dilatory motions within their power for the purpose of preventing the action of the House.

I submit further that it is not entirely proper for a gentleman who has taken up as much of the time of the House in discussion as any other one to deliver lectures to the other members of the House in relation to the time they shall consume in discussion.

Now, sir, that is all I desire to say, except to ask one question of the Chair. I desire to ask the Chair whether, if the motion to lay the credentials upon the table shall prevail, they can be brought before the House again by a majority vote, or whether it will require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. This being a question of privilege, affecting the right of a member to a seat, the credentials can be called up at any time if laid upon the table.

Mr. WILSON. If laid upon the table by a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. They can be taken up by a vote of the House at any time.

Mr. WILSON. By a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. They can; in that respect privileged questions differ from all other business.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the House is, with good reason, I observe, quite tired of this discussion, and so far as I am responsible for it, I will bring it to a close immediately.

I wish merely to call the House back, if I can, to the simple proposition before it, for as long as I have been here during these times, I have tried at all times to find some common ground upon which we can all stand and all work, rather than to seek points of difference between me and my neighbor whom I know to be just as earnest and as patriotic as myself; and therefore, so far as the peculiar duties of the Committee of Elections are concerned, during the last Congress and during this, whenever questions of this kind have cropped out I have at all times refrained, as far as possible, from seeking points upon which I may be able to differ from those around me, but have sought rather to gather up at all times those upon which we can all agree.

I have not this morning, sir, sought to break a lance with the distinguished and patriotic gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] Least of all has my vanity so overcome me as to lead me to seek to wrestle with my friend and colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL:] but let me say to him that in his attempt to cooperate with the gentleman from Maryland in stifling even for the time being the simple petition of the loyal men of Arkansas to be heard here in this House, he is not true to the ancient fame of the State of Massachusetts in that regard, however true he may be to her principles in all others, and however shining may be the light he has brought into this House. Sir, I, for one, have been raised in quite a different school at home from this. I have been brought up in a school that stood shoulder to shoulder, through many a fight, with "the old man eloquent" in Massachusetts in securing every one, high or low, to the humblest individual, though he may be in the farthest nook or corner of this great Republic, a right, not merely to come here with his petition and have it laid upon the table to suit our convenience, but to have it referred to a committee to examine into the facts and causes and reasons of his complaint and his grievance, and to report thereon to this House for its action.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would say to my colleague that my remarks proceeded upon the idea that the pending proposition is to lay these credentials upon the table for the time being and temporarily merely, and not as a final disposition of the matter.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague cannot fail to see that if the matter shall be postponed until the discussions in this House shall bring us to a united course of action in regard to the treatment due to the rebel States it will be equivalent to saying to the petitioners, "Wait till a distant and far-off day." This Congress will have ceased from its labors, and we shall have returned to our constituents to give an account of our delay and waste of time in wrangling over non-essentials here, before these men could be heard here in this Hall, if that day shall be waited for. Sir, I will not stop to say to my friend from Maryland that no familiarity with violence at the polls, no violent interference with the attempt of the people to express their free choice at the ballot-box, however feeble that voice may be, however inadequate may be the expression of their desire and of their loyalty, no matter how little in accordance with legal forms, when they come to the essential and heart of the matter—no familiarity, I say, with that, however long continued on the part of others, has taught me or can ever reconcile me for one moment to the attempt here in this House to stifle their voice.

Sir, the gentleman from Maryland deprecates the decision of important questions like those which lie under and hang about this, on so collateral a matter as the decision of a man's right to a seat on this floor, yet he proposed, himself, to decide it by a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether Louisiana was not one of the rebel States, whether persons did not come here with credentials from that State, whether we did not receive their credentials and refer them to the Committee of Elections, and whether the report of that committee was not made, received, and acted upon? I ask whether Arkansas stands in any different relations to the Union than Louisiana does. If not, where is the difference so far as suicide is concerned, or self-destruction, or political or military interference?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, on the question of reference of these credentials to the Committee of Elections, I refuse to argue that more important question which so underlies our work here, and which we so trifle with. I do not know how far in the argument of it I may be led to differ with my friend from Maryland or with my distinguished colleague on my right, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If, however, I understood his enunciation to-day, his principle, and his line of conduct here, I must say, with a good deal of want of confidence in my own ability, that I am unable, as yet, to bring myself to those grounds.

But I propose, sir, to listen, to wait, to learn, and to sit at the feet of these Gamaliels until I shall see the line and the path of duty made clear and plain. If they will throw as few obstacles as a sense and conviction of their duty will permit them in the way of the proper discharge of their functions by the Committee of Elections, I will assure those gentlemen, distinguished heads and leaders of a committee appointed in this House to consider an important subject, I will throw no obstacle in the way of their coming to a grave and proper conclusion. It may be that, in the forming of the Constitution of this Government it was the idea of our fathers that the States, as States, were to be represented in the other branch of Congress, and that the people, as a people, were to be represented in this branch of Congress, and that our fathers foreseeing, not the great and overshadowing proportions of any such rebellion as this, but that there might probably come a time when the State governments would fail to coöperate with the national Government in securing to the people of those States representation, clothed Congress with the power of prescribing the mode and manner of the election of Representatives in Congress by the inhabitants occupying a particular geographical district, without dependence upon or the necessity for the coöperation of the State itself. I simply throw this out as a suggestion, for I am to wait for the learning which will be brought to bear on this subject by that committee which is to this House its eyes and its ears on that great subject.

The gentleman, my colleague, says that there cannot be such a thing as a State while there is no State organization. If the gentleman means by State organization Governors and legislators, then I say there is no more necessity for the existence of legislators in a State, to secure representation here to the people of a geographical district of a State, than there is that there shall be constables, in full glory, in that district. The precedents and history of the whole Government are against any such conclusion as that. If I remember, Arkansas entered this Union as one of the sister States in the olden time, and her Representatives admitted upon this floor before there had existed any State Legislature there. She was admitted in that way in accordance with the opinion of the then Attorney General of the United States. Michigan, by having a constitution which by the act of admission was ratified and sanctioned by the Government as republican in form, sprang into existence as a State by a vote of this House and the other branch without legislators, and her Representatives were admitted here before the organization of her State government. So with Kansas and with California. California was under a military governor, I will tell my friend.

Mr. SHANNON. If the gentleman will permit me I will make a remark in reference to the case of California. She was admitted into this Union when she was under a military governor.

Mr. DAWES. I was going to say that myself.

Mr. SHANNON. By mere formal recommendation of the Secretary of State, on the suggestion of the President of the United States, the military governor of California called a convention to frame a State constitution, and so little was known of the population that the members had to be apportioned according to territory, and not according to population. A constitution of State government was formed, and they sent that here with Senators and Representatives, demanding admission as a State into the Union. The slave power was then in control here, and it refused to admit them, upon the mere pretext that the Missouri compromise line of 36° 30' extended to the Pacific. That would have cut the State in two and made the lower half a slave State. She was under a military governor when she was admitted.

Mr. DAWES. I wish simply to state, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] what has been so well stated by my friend from California in reference to there being a military governor in that State previous to her admission into the Union. That military governor instituted rules and regulations which had the force of law in that Territory touching the collection of the revenue of the United States. When the question came up before the Supreme Court of the United States they decided contrary to the position taken by my friend from Pennsylvania, who, the other day, interrogated the gentleman from Louisiana with apparent triumph to know the basis and authority for the appointment of a military governor for that State. The rules and regulations of the military governor of California, which had the force of law for the collection of revenue in that State, were sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States. I had the book here and read from it during the last Congress in the hearing of my friend from Pennsylvania and during the discussion of the Louisiana case. Thus much upon the question of referring these credentials to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. Speaker, I can see very well what grave questions are to trouble us in the discussion of this subject upon this floor. In the examination of the questions which come before the Committee of Elections, they have hitherto not found it necessary to involve those graver and more serious questions; and I trust that they may be able to put them off still further. I trust that they may be able to get through without the discussion of collateral questions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not assume, as my friend from Maryland has assumed, that Arkansas or any other State has the power at any time to break up this Union, for I have supposed that we have been for three years long defying and denouncing the men in rebellion, saying to them, "You shall not accomplish what you are attempting to accomplish. You shall not take these States out of the Union and achieve what you seek to accomplish." It was the language here of the leaders of rebellion in the winter of 1860-61, "Secession is an accomplished fact." I pray members not to adopt that language. Never at any moment did the majority of the people of Arkansas, that people that my colleague strangely asserts are omnipotent at all times, whether they spoke constitutionally or not, or according to the limitations they have placed upon themselves or not; never did that majority ever set aside their constitutional obligations; and when the confusion and smoke of this war and this discussion shall have passed away it will appear that at no time did there exist a majority of these people to attempt to do that which we have declared before the nations of the world they shall never do, and that they never can do, because we are one people. Not one third, in my belief, and according to the facts which have come to my knowledge, did there ever exist in that State who were disposed to take that State out of the Union if they had the power; and to say to that one third, that miserable, deluded, wicked set of rebels that have succeeded in accomplishing that which we have waged two years of bloody war to prevent them from doing, is what I do not propose to say at least upon this question of reference to the Committee of Elections, and, I trust in God, shall never be called upon to say. And therefore it is, I trust, the House will dispose of this. I yield to my friend from Maryland, according to agreement, to renew the motion to lay the credentials on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will detain the House with but one or two more observations.

Before I proceed I ask to enter a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote of the House by which the bill of the House (No. 244) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government was yesterday recommitted to the select committee on the rebellious States.

The motion was entered and passed over for the present.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts conceded everything I desired to accomplish by my action. I merely wished to call the attention of the House to the gravity of the questions involved in the ordinary reference to the Committee of Elections. I wish the House to understand that they do not merely pass upon the question whether the gentleman who is the claimant had received so many votes or whether somebody else had received so many votes; but they pass upon the question whether a small proportion of the small population of Arkansas shall send here a Representative to help control the residue of the nation; whether they shall be entitled to send Senators to the other House of Congress; whether they shall be entitled to send electors of President and Vice President, possibly to turn the balance of the presidential electors. Those are the questions involved, and the discussion has developed them to my satisfaction.

When, however, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] refers to the mode in which States have been recognized from Territories of the United States, and when he says they have been admitted simply by the admission of their members upon this floor, he concedes everything that justifies the motion I made; because he admits that if this gentleman is admitted upon this floor, it carries with it an admission in this House that there is a State government organized and existing in Arkansas, which we have recognized and which we cannot refuse to recognize. The admission carries with it everything that induced me to make the motion.

As he has referred to the case of Michigan and the case of California, I desire to say that California, as I remember the law, was admitted by an act of the two Houses of Congress, signed by the President. It is said in objection that no precedent act of Congress had authorized them to form a government. That is true; and although it might have been more formal for that act to have preceded it, yet it was in the competency of Congress to recognize what the people had done, and their recognition made it law. And now if we recognize what the people in this district have done we make it a law, not simply with reference to the seat of this gentleman, but with reference to the whole government of Arkansas; because if one man can be so elected and admitted, his admission concludes everything.

Hence the importance of the House deliberately forming its own judgment whether or not there is a government in Arkansas that can send members here to help the rest of the Representatives of the United States, or to increase or diminish the ruling majority in this House, or to help decide the presidential election next fall. For these are the questions we are to decide by our act, and not whether the claimant has votes enough to entitle him, under ordinary circumstances, to a seat in this House.

But there is another point which I am unwilling to pass over without a single observation. For the sake of the American name, for the respect of republican government, for the sake of the precedent to posterity, I enter my protest against any paper being considered a certificate of election whose highest sanction is the name of the provost marshal of the district. Let me refer to the proclamation of General Banks. I refer to it because dangerous doctrines are gaining a hold upon the public mind, in my judgment, touching the foundations of the Republic. No man has a greater regard for General Banks than I have; but I shudder when I find his proclamation summoning the people of Louisiana to an election under a declaration that martial law is the fundamental law of the State of Louisiana.

And here in this case what do we find? The provost marshal at Fort Smith, Arkansas, issues this paper:

"This is to certify that Volney V. Milor is a duly authorized commissioner of elections in and for Sebastian county in the State of Arkansas, and is a duly authorized acting commissioner in and for the congressional district of northwestern Arkansas, appointed as such agent by the Union Association of the State of Arkansas."

A provost marshal certifies that a political caucus, getting together in a corner, authorized a man to erect a State in Arkansas! If there were no other ground, Mr. Speaker, I would protest against referring this paper to any committee.

Mr. DAWES. Let me say to the gentleman from Maryland that the certificates of all the Representatives from Virginia for the last fifty years have been signed by a commissioner of elections, and the gentleman has never been shocked thereat till to-day.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not perceive the point. It is not whether the law of a State may prescribe one species of certificate or another, but it is that it appears on the face of the paper produced that the only authentic certificate is that of a provost marshal, the marshal of a camp, the executive officer of a military organization! That is not the law of Arkansas. And he does not certify to the election, but he certifies to the fact that this man Milor was appointed "as such agent by the Union Association of the State of Arkansas." Is the Union Association a State? Is it, as a body of men, known to the law? Is it a government? Is it anything excepting a caucus collected together, sanctioned by the military authorities, to send members to this House?

Now, in reference to another point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I respectfully say that a "military governor" is appointed under no law of the United States; he has no assigned functions. It is a mere name created in an office in Washington and given to a man who is not charged with any legal duties. A general is known to the law and has a right to exercise all over the rebel country within the limits of his command the authority of a military commander; that is, to remove traitors, to suppress violence, and to exercise the ordinary police powers in time of war. Beyond that he has no power. And when the gentleman refers to the judgment of the Supreme Court with reference to California, and says that they recognized the authority of a military governor, I respectfully differ from him as to the judgment of the Supreme Court. They recognized the right of the President of the United States to levy military contributions in Mexico, flagrante bello. When that "military governor," as he is called, undertook to create a court to determine on questions of prizes in California, the Supreme Court said there was no authority to exercise that function of Government excepting by the legislative authority of the United States. It is only under the assumption of illegal authority by the Executive—one of the make-shifts of the times; because, in my judgment, Congress has not done its duty in prescribing how the national authority shall be enforced over the rebellious States, that such a thing as a "military governor" is known anywhere.

Mr. DAWES. I will state to the gentleman what I understand the decision of the Supreme Court to have been in the California case. A collector of customs was appointed by the military governor of California. He instituted rules and regulations, attempting to give to them the force of law, as to the manner of collecting and the amount of the customs. They covered three periods of time; one period during the war, a second period after the war had ceased and before the revenue laws of the United States were by act of Congress extended over that Territory, and a third period after by act of Congress the revenue laws were extended over that Territory but before the collector appointed under those laws reached California. The duties collected were paid over by that collector into the hands of the collector appointed under the law of Congress. Suit was brought to recover the money thus paid under protest. The decision of the Supreme Court covered the three points, flagrante bello, in peace without revenue laws, and while there were revenue laws but no other officer but the military governor and his collector. I submit to my learned friend that I am entirely mistaken in my reading if the Supreme Court of the United States did not sanction the rules and regulations and give to them the force of law for the periods while war was raging between the cessation of hostilities and the extension of the revenue laws over that port, and while there were no other officers but the military governor. The authority for the appointment of a military governor is discussed in that opinion, discussed by the Secretary of State at that time and by the then President of the United States. It is founded by them all in the authority of the Commander-in-Chief to appoint all the military officers necessary to carry out his functions as Commander-in-Chief. My friend might just as well inquire of me what legal authority there is to place pickets on the frontier line of our forces, or to place a guard over prisoners of war, as to inquire of me what legal authority, if he mean statute authority, there is for the appointment of a military governor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. A military governor is an officer unknown to the laws of the United States. He is charged with no functions by law. His appointment is not confirmed by the Senate. He has no fixed salary. He is a mere agent of the President without any authority of law whatever to appoint him. If he be an incident of the police of the camp, well and good. That gives him no authority to institute a political movement. By reference to the Supreme Court reports it will be seen that it was decided that the money collected was not even money in the Treasury of the United States, and I think that Congress had to pass a law subsequently to enable it to go into the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me a single word?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish that we shall inadvertently, by any record of ours, so entangle ourselves that hereafter we may be estopped from denying the particular condition of those States. Differing equally with the gentleman from Massachusetts and with the gentleman from Maryland on their expressed notions about the status of those States, and yet considering that before the case goes to the Committee of Elections, the condition of the State ought to be decided, and that speedily. I hope it will be seen by all the gentlemen of the House that the best disposition to make of the case is to refer the question to the select committee on the insurrectionary States.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, is the Congress of the United States confined to that side of the House?

The SPEAKER.—The Chair was waiting for some gentleman to call his attention to the fact that gentlemen are not in their seats, as the rule requires. Gentlemen standing in the aisles must resume their seats.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he could not find authority for the Committee of Elections over this subject, when he found authority for his vote to admit West Virginia, and with his leave I will read his views on that subject, that the House may see where he is leading us. This is what my friend said:

"I shall vote for the admission of this State, and I desire to state the grounds for so doing. I do not desire to be understood as being deluded by the idea that we are admitting this State in pursuance of any provisions of the Constitution. I find no such provision that justifies it, and the argument in favor of the constitutionality of it is one got up by those who either honestly entertain, I think, an erroneous opinion, or who desire to justify, by a forced construction, an act which they have predetermined to do. By the Constitution a State may be divided by the consent of the Legislature thereof, and by the consent of Congress admitting the new State into the Union.

"Now, sir, it is but mockery, in my judgment, to tell me that the Legislature of Virginia has ever consented to this division."

Further on the gentleman says:

"But, sir, I understand that these proceedings take place, not under any pretense of legal or constitutional right, but in virtue of the laws of war; and by the laws of nations these laws are just what we choose to make them."

This is the lead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I warn this side of the House against following it.

Mr. STEVENS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. These are precisely the doctrines that I hold yet. When West Virginia applied for admission, it was pretended that old Virginia had given her consent to the partition, because a few gentlemen in old Virginia had gone to one corner of that State, at Wheeling, and declared that they were old Virginia, and that they consented to the partition, and then that they were West Virginia, and consented to make it a new State.

Mr. DAWES. I am not justifying the vote, for I voted against it.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that the gentleman voted against it, because he did not believe that the Constitution permitted it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the members on that side of the House voted for the admission of West Virginia, knowing that it was a violation of the Constitution?

Mr. STEVENS. No; it was only I that did that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Knowing that it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania who did that, I want to warn the House, lest by again following him they commit other errors.

Mr. COX. Take it as a warning to do so no more.

Mr. STEVENS. I do take it as a warning. I know that the gentleman from Massachusetts has a great respect for me, and I am always glad when he finds something I have said worth reading. As he has read what I said upon the admission of West Virginia into the Union, I hope that he will read also what I said about the investigating committee last Congress.

Mr. DAWES. The last House disposed of what the gentleman said about that by a majority of four to one.

Mr. STEVENS. To go on with what I was saying: I do not regret having voted in favor of the admission of West Virginia. I do not say that it was in accordance with the Constitution administered in time of peace. I knew that the Constitution and martial law were not at war with each other. I do not regret having voted for the admission of West Virginia, except when I find its members voting against us, and then I wish it the other way. [Laughter.]

I did not rise to make a speech. I am glad that the House is in a good humor, and I expect that it is ready now to vote. I move that the credentials be referred to the select committee on the reconstruction of the States, and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is not, in my opinion, important whether this paper, purporting to be the credentials, I believe, of some gentleman elected from the State of Arkansas, shall go to the Committee of Elections, the select committee on reconstruction of the rebellious States, or to the Committee on the Judiciary. Either one of those committees would satisfy me.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that this debate proves one thing, if nothing more: that, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] has said, underneath this question of the admission of a gentleman as a member upon this floor there is a more important question, and that is whether there is a State to be represented here or not. Believing that to be the case, I think that the reference should take such shape, whether by going to one committee or another, that it should be accompanied by instructions directing the committee to investigate and report upon the main fact before the incidental question is reached or can be properly disposed of. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has moved that the credentials be referred to the select committee on the rebellious States. I think myself that there is an appropriateness in that. That committee, if I remember the resolution defining its power, was appointed for the purpose of considering the plan of reconstruction contained in the President's message, and all questions pertinent thereto. If it be that that select committee was raised with a view to consider this very question, whether a State exists there or not, then these credentials should properly be referred to it.

But, as I have said, I am indifferent to what committee they should go. Still, to whatever committee they are referred, I want the committee to be instructed to treat first what the gentleman from Massachusetts has called the underlying question before reaching the subordinate questions. I move, therefore, as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the following instructions: that the committee investigate and report, by bill or otherwise, whether there is any such existing organized government in the State of Arkansas as entitles the State and its people to be represented in the Congress of the United States.

On that proposition I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. What is to be understood by reporting by bill or otherwise? I suggest to the gentleman that there is no particular occasion, either in the position taken by the Committee of Elections or otherwise, to treat the Committee of Elections differently from what you would any other committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my demand for the previous question in order to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman inquires what I mean by requiring of this committee to report by bill or otherwise. What I mean is, to make the power of the committee broad enough to cover any contingency in the case. If they shall come to the conclusion that there is a State here with a constitution knocking through its Representatives for admission at the door of the United States, that they may present a bill for the consideration of the House for admitting that State, or for recognizing that State rather, as it is an old State, as an existing organization.

But I do not confine them to a report by bill. Purposely I put in the broad general language, "report by bill or otherwise," so that if they will they may give a special verdict, and simply report back to this House the facts.

Now, as to meaning any disrespect to the Committee of Elections, I thought I had already sufficiently disclaimed any such intention. I have expressed myself almost indifferent as to which one of three or four committees named this question might properly be referred to. I should not much object to its going to the Committee of Elections, or to the Committee on the Judiciary, as involving a great question of constitutional power. But inasmuch as the House has already raised a select committee upon the President's message relating to this very subject and this class of subjects, I think it very appropriate in the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move to refer the matter to that select committee. To whatever committee it may go, thinking it should not go without instructions such as I have proposed, I move those instructions in reference to both the motions to refer. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I had a right to the floor before the gentleman from Ohio called the previous question. I claimed the floor before he offered his amendment and before he called the previous question upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was upon the floor, but had yielded it momentarily to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. He did not yield it to the gentleman from Massachusetts until I had claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio did not surrender the floor at all; and for that reason the Chair ruled that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BLAIR] could not move to lay the matter upon the table, as he indicated a desire to do.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to nobody else, although half a dozen other gentlemen wanted to take it from me.

Mr. COX. I ask my colleague to yield it to me a moment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order. I ask the gentleman if he insists upon the demand for the previous question when we did not know upon what specific proposition he proposed to call the previous question until my friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] took the floor? The Speaker himself was not aware, until long after my friend had the floor, what the specific proposition was which came from the gentleman on the other side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that that is not a point of order. The Chair asked the gentleman from Ohio whether he moved his instructions to apply to both motions of reference, or only to one, and he replied, in the course of his remarks, that he desired it applied to both.

Mr. COX. I rise to another point of order. It is that the amendment of my colleague is not germane to a matter of this kind, for the reason that there is nothing involved in this matter except the reference of this memorial. That reference is under the rule of the House which was read a moment ago by the Clerk. It requires that the Committee of Elections shall "examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials, of the members returned to serve in this House; and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question, and be referred to them by the House." These are privileged questions, and this petition goes to that committee as a matter of course. It can go to no other committee. There is nothing whatever in this question which involves reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot sustain the point of order; and he does so upon the very rule to which the gentleman refers. It is the duty of the Committee of Elections "to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question, and be referred to them by the House." The question of the organization of the State of Arkansas has come into debate to-day, and any motion to refer that question to the committee is in order.

The Chair would state further, that he thinks the instructions are certainly in order as germane to the very question before the House; but when the Committee of Elections report as to whether a gentleman is or is not entitled to a seat, then the usage is, that no collateral questions can be moved as amendments, because the person claiming the seat has a right to have the question decided whether he is or is not a Representative.

Mr. COX. The Chair will permit me to make one suggestion. It does not appear by the paper presented here that this case involves the question of reconstruction. The Chair only finds it out by hearing the debate here, the loose debate which has sprung up, and which has no relevancy to this petition so far as the face of it shows. And yet, upon simply hearing this loose and irrelevant debate, the Chair holds that the instructions proposed by my colleague are relevant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds it to be competent for the House to instruct any committee which they have appointed or authorized to be appointed.

The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to inquire what will be the order of the questions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was just about to state it. The first question after the instructions will be on the reference to the standing committee, as that takes priority of a motion to refer to a select committee.

Mr. DAWES. That is upon my motion to refer the credentials to the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Does that cut off the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It does not, as the amendment has priority of either.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the amendment to be to refer to a select committee, and my motion takes precedence of that.

Mr. STEVENS. The amendment is an instruction to both committees, and if it is carried I am entirely indifferent as to which committee the matter is referred to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that after the main question is ordered the first question will be upon the instructions moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK] because they apply to both committees. The next question will be upon reference to the standing Committee of Elections, as by the rules that question takes priority. If that fails, then the question will be upon reference to the select committee.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden, Elliot, Frank, Garfield, Hale, Higby, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elhu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—104.

So the instructions were rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COBB stated that Mr. SLOAN was detained from the House by severe sickness in his family.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the reference of the credentials to the Committee of Elections; and they were so referred.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSUL GENERAL TO CANADA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the House of the 8th instant, transmitting a report to the Secretary of State and the documents by which it was accompanied, touching the arrest of the United States consul general to the British North American provinces, and certain official communications respecting Canadian commerce.

The message and documents were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, asked and obtained permission to have his vote recorded on the conscription bill; he voted "no."

Mr. PATTERSON obtained the like privilege, and voted "ay."

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, obtained the like privilege, and voted "no."

Messrs. C. A. WHITE, HARRINGTON, and KING obtained the like permission, and voted "no."

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House insist upon its amendments to the conscription bill, and ask for a committee of conference. The Senate has simply non-concurred in everything that the House did.

Mr. STILES. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is very often the practice for the body that non-concurs to let the other body ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection. This is the usual course in matters of this kind.

Mr. STILES. Let it come up in the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the regular order, as I understand, to ask that a committee of conference be appointed.

Mr. STILES withdrew his objection; and Mr. SCHENCK's motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House proceed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the amendments, on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to offer the amendment which I suggested yesterday. It is to amend the fifth Senate amendment by inserting after the word "proof," in the thirty-fourth line, the following:

Provided, That on all spirits on hand for sale distilled prior to the 1st day of March, 1864, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the duty of twenty cents per gallon as provided by the laws now in force, a duty of twenty cents on each and every gallon: Provided, That this proviso shall not apply to any case where such spirits may be owned and held bona fide in the usual course of business in quantities of ten barrels and under.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not applicable to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, so far as the amendment is concerned to which this is intended to refer; but the Chair holds that the amendment cannot now be offered, as the first amendment of the Senate is now under consideration. The gentleman from Ohio can offer it by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. Then I offer it by unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question before the House, it is upon concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the House bill. I have not looked closely into all these amendments, but there is one important one into which I have looked to some extent, and on which I propose to offer a few suggestions. I allude to that amendment of the Senate striking out the provision in the House bill that taxesspirits on hand forty cents per gallon in addition to the twenty cents per gallon paid under the present law. When the amendment was offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] while the original bill was pending in the House, without reflection, without looking to the consequences which would result to those engaged in the manufacture of the article, I gave it my vote. But for that fact I should not trouble the House with any remarks on the subject.

Subsequent reflection and examination, Mr. Speaker, have satisfied me that the provision is wrong. I propose to support the amendment of the Senate striking it out of the House bill.

I propose now to assign a few reasons in support of the amendment of the Senate, and in opposition to the provision of the House bill. In the first place, it is a provision unusual in the history of our legislation. It is certainly unjust to those who, after the passage of the act of 1862, embarked their capital in this manufacture. After the passage of that bill I believe there was an implied obligation on the part of this Government that it would not impose any additional burden upon the manufacture of spirits. When Congress passed the internal revenue law during last Congress, they said to those engaged in that branch of business that the stock manufactured prior to that time should not be taxed; and the implied pledge on the part of Congress may be inferred from its action from that day to the introduction of the House bill now under consideration. Why do I say this? Look at the revenue bills introduced into this House; look to all of our tariffs, and you will find that the Congress of the United States has jealously guarded those who are engaged in any of the trades of the country against any retroactive duty upon articles in hand. Hence it is that in the adjustment of tariffs great care has been taken by Congress not to impose upon those engaged in trade duties beyond those imposed by the law under which they produced the article.

That, sir, has been a very general feature of our legislation. I believe that our tariff bills increasing duties upon imports will bear me out. Heretofore when the Government has imposed additional duties, it has guarded against the imposition of those duties upon articles purchased and in transit to this country—articles purchased and imported from foreign countries under a former scale of tariff. So it is in regard to the tariff that reduces the duty upon imports. The principle is the same, and has been uniformly adhered to by Congress. Relief has been given to those engaged in importing articles by abatement of the duties upon the cargoes that were on the way to this country when the reduction was made.

I think then, sir, that those who were engaged in the manufacture of spirits had the right to infer the Government had given them an implied pledge that it would not increase the tax upon the article after being manufactured. I believe that it is a sound principle, and that it ought to be pursued by the Government.

The amendment of the gentleman from New York incorporated into the House bill will not only subvert the general practice of the Government, if it is adopted, but it will unsettle the trade, and produce among manufacturers the greatest degree of uncertainty in regard to their business. If it be adopted it will bring bankruptcy to many of the most enterprising men in the country, who have engaged in this manufacture relying upon the implied pledge of Congress not to impose an additional tax upon the stock on hand.

It is the duty of the Government in the adjustment of duties and taxes to so adjust them as to do the least possible damage to the trade of the country. When you violently strike one branch of trade, a commercial chord is touched that vibrates throughout the country. I am not willing, therefore, to vote for the House provision that will bring bankruptcy to the doors of the enterprising men who on the faith of a tax already fixed by Government have devoted their capital and energy to this branch of business. I will not ruin these men in order to reach a few speculators over their destruction.

I have said that by insisting upon the House amendment and imposing this additional tax of forty cents upon all liquors manufactured hereafter, you destroy the manufacturing establishments of this country. And now I will proceed to give my reasons for saying so. The argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] yesterday, that it would not thus affect those engaged in this manufacture, may apply to the distillers in and about the city of New York. It may apply to them for this reason, that they can put into the market and dispose of in one day what they manufactured the day before; for that being the great commercial emporium of the country, there is always a market there. But it does not so operate upon the distillers in the interior and at the West. Why? Simply because they have to bring their product to the city of New York in order to find a market for it. It takes time to do that. It is not the work of a day or of a week. An inquiry into the matter will satisfy any man that it is almost impossible to get from the State of Illinois into the New York market a cargo of whisky in less than from thirty to forty days. Hence those engaged in its manufacture in the western States are subjected to a loss which those who are near the central market, and who can manufacture one day and sell the next, are not subjected to.

It is for that reason that the panic which has occurred in the whisky market recently, in consequence of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, has caught the western distillers with a large amount of the article on hand, and upon which they must necessarily sustain a heavy loss, if they are not entirely ruined thereby. On this account it is wrong to impose this additional burden on them. Had they been in reach of New York, and in the situation of the distillers of New York, they could have turned over, before this panic in that branch of trade, the stock they had on hand, and thereby have placed themselves in the same situation as the New York distillers.

Owing to the immense amount of business upon the railroads of the West, and the large demand for rolling stock on those roads, it has been for the last ten months almost impossible for men, sometimes for weeks after they had a cargo ready for transportation, to obtain rolling stock to remove it from their distilleries.

Then, again, owing to the pressure of the Government for railroad facilities, and the taking of the cars for the transportation of live stock which cannot be put down and left by the way, cargo after cargo of whisky has from time to time been turned out into the sheds and streets to await a more convenient season for transportation. And thus those who are engaged in the manufacture have not been able to get their product to the market.

This amendment introduced by the gentleman from New York has left upon the hands of the western distillers a large amount of spirits which they have been unable to sell owing to the depressed price of the article, growing out of this proposed additional tax of forty cents upon it. It may be said that it ought not thus to affect them; that they have engaged in the enterprise and should take their chances; that although they may suffer loss, they ought to sell, if their necessities require, whatever the article is worth in the market. One reason why they could not do that is the uncertainty which has hung over this subject since the adoption by the House of the amendment of the gentleman from New York. They could not sell for the reason that if they took the reduced price—and it will be remembered that upon the introduction of that amendment the price dropped down twenty-five cents per gallon—in a few days they were ruined, because it cost them in price of grain, labor, and transportation, a sum far beyond what it was worth in the market.

They could not sell for another reason; they were uncertain what would be the fate of this proposed additional tax of forty cents. They could not sell at seventy or seventy-five cents for the reason that if they did so, they would be liable, if this additional tax passed, to be called upon to pay it, and that was ruin to them. The consequence has been that they have been compelled to hold back the stock they had on hand, awaiting the decision of Congress, and hoping that our legislative action here might be so directed as not to ruin them utterly and break down this great source of revenue in the western country. To us in the West it is an important interest; to the Government it is an important interest; and I think I will be able to show any reflecting man that the Government can gain nothing by prostrating these manufacturers even though it gets all the taxes it expects to raise by assessing this forty cents per gallon upon the liquor already manufactured.

Illinois, sir, manufactures more gallons of spirituous liquors than any other State in the Union, not even New York excepted. The census returns of 1860 show that she manufactures twenty million gallons per year, while New York and Ohio manufacture only fifteen million gallons each, in round numbers. I am placing the estimate now at what it was when the census of 1860 was taken, not what it is actually at this day owing to the increased facilities and the enlargement of these establishments.

Upon the manufacture of twenty million gallons of this article in Illinois the Government, from the tax of sixty cents per gallon which the Senate's amendment proposes to impose, would derive the immense revenue of nearly forty million dollars per annum. The city of Peoria is manufacturing daily about forty thousand gallons of spirits. A tax upon that of sixty cents per gallon would yield to the Government a revenue of $24,000 per day, or $7,200,000 per annum. She has, I believe, twelve or fourteen distilleries in active operation, and she proposes, if permitted to go on and carry out the work in which she is engaged, to pay to this Government a revenue of $7,200,000 per annum.

The city of Chicago, with four establishments of this character, is manufacturing daily about twenty-four thousand gallons. A tax of sixty cents per gallon upon that will yield to the Government $14,400 a day, or $4,320,000 per annum. Thus the two cities of Peoria and Chicago, from the manufacture of this article alone, under the tax proposed in the Senate bill, will yield to the Government a revenue of nearly twelve million dollars per annum.

Now, sir, what is proposed? It is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] by the House bill, to tax these establishments forty cents per gallon, in addition to the twenty cents already paid, on all that they have manufactured, and also to impose that tax on all that may be in the hands of speculators, for the purpose of raising revenue for the Government.

Now, sir, the best estimates that the Committee of Ways and Means could procure, estimates founded upon the best statistical information that was available, show us that there are not more than about two hundred thousand barrels of distilled spirits in the United States to-day, upon which the tax of forty cents, if all the liquor were taxed and all the tax collected, would not yield the Government an amount of more than four million dollars.

I submit, then, if it is a wise policy, aside from the justice of the question, to destroy this vast distilling interest in the West that will yield such a large revenue to the Government merely for the purpose of securing to the Government the $4,000,000 of taxes which may be assessed and collected on the stock now on hand, when the evidence is that this additional tax of forty cents will break down and effectually destroy a large portion, if not all, of the manufacturers in the western States? It seems to me, sir, that it would be a folly only equaled by that recorded in the fable of the man who slew the goose that laid the golden eggs.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRINNELL. He speaks of the number of million dollars that would accrue from the tax on whisky in the cities of Peoria and Chicago.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to ask him if he means to say that those cities will pay that tax into the Treasury.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. No, sir; and I did not say so. I mean to say that if this tax of sixty cents per gallon proposed in the Senate bill is imposed upon whisky, the amount manufactured in Peoria and Chicago alone will yield to the Government annually over eleven million dollars, if they are not destroyed by this proposed additional tax of forty cents per gallon on what they have already manufactured.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 44.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not rejoice over the fact that so much money goes into the Treasury.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do, sir; and it is for the purpose of saving these distillers from bankruptcy and enabling the men engaged in that business to carry it on that I advocate the Senate amendment and oppose the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] which would entirely destroy the business.

Mr. GRINNELL. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to assent to the proposition that a high tax on whisky will not lessen its consumption?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. It may be that a high tax will lessen the consumption.

Mr. GRINNELL. But not much.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. The difficulty under which the gentleman from Iowa labors is that he imagines that all spirits manufactured is consumed as a beverage.

Mr. GRINNELL. No, sir.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. If the gentleman will take the pains to look into the commercial statistics he will find that so far from that being the case, less than one fifth of the quantity manufactured is consumed in the country as a beverage.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman says that this tax will break up the business. Now, if a high tax will not much diminish the consumption I want to know whether, there being an undiminished demand for the article, the supply will not keep pace with it? If so, how are these distilling establishments to be broken up?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I think I can answer the gentleman intelligibly, but whether he is able to comprehend it or not is a question for him, not for me. Under the act of 1862, distillers in Illinois engaged extensively in the manufacture of spirits under the implied pledge of the Government that they were to be required to pay but twenty cents per gallon duty. They had to invest immense sums of money in putting up establishments and preparing for the manufacture. They had to invest large amounts in the purchase of grain, corn, and rye to be used in distillation. And all this they did on the implied faith of the Government that on the production of their distilleries a duty of twenty cents per gallon would be imposed and no more. Their entire calculations were made in regard to that state of things. This bill, as it passed the House, imposed on the stock on hand an additional duty of forty cents per gallon. Its immediate effect was to reduce the price of the article twenty-five cents per gallon, and to induce the capitalists on whom distillers relied for advances to withdraw their accommodations. The distillers were informed that this action of the House had unsettled the whisky market, and that there was a danger of loss and bankruptcy in the trade. They were unable to obtain further drafts on the stock shipped from the West to the East, and were compelled to submit to whatever loss might arise.

There is not an establishment in Chicago or in Peoria that can pay this additional tax. They could not raise the funds to do it. The legislation of the House has so unsettled the trade that moneyed men will refuse to advance money to distillers on commission, and they will be left to the mercy of the winds and the waves, and to the mercy of my friend from New York. If they are unable to pay this additional tax their stock must go to the hammer, first to pay the tax to the Government, and secondly to pay for the advances already made by the commission merchants in New York, and they will be left with nothing to prosecute their business, and their establishments must close. Others, taking warning from their fate, will not renew a business liable at any day to be destroyed by the action of Congress, and this source of revenue will be lost to the Government.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is not for the interest of the manufacturers who are to have this additional tax upon the article to be manufactured to pay, to require a tax to be paid upon the quantity now on hand?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. If the manufacturer was fortunate enough, before the introduction of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, or before the passage of the House bill imposing this additional tax, to sell out his stock on hand at a good profit, as I have no doubt the distillers in the gentleman's district did, perhaps it would be for his interest to have an additional tax laid upon the stock on hand, or at least it would not affect him injuriously since he had none on hand to be affected by it. But in reference to these men in the West who, owing to the difficulties of transportation, were caught with large quantities of liquors on hand or in transitu by this bill of the House, if you impose these additional burdens upon the stock on hand they will not be able to raise the money to pay it, and they will necessarily go by the board.

Now, sir, what I contend for is that we ought to so conduct our legislation as not thus violently to interrupt the current of commerce, and thus break down those who are engaged in it, in a commerce that if properly cared for by the Government will yield an immense revenue. Sir, the dictates of reason would sustain us in adopting such a course of legislation.

But it is said that speculators have very largely invested in this article with the view of selling for an increased price when an additional tax was imposed. Well, sir, it may be so. I grant it; but when was there a time in the history of the country that speculators have not always invested their capital in commodities which they expected to sell at an increased price? What speculator would invest his money in any article of trade or branch of commerce if he did not expect to realize money from his investment? I cannot understand why there should be such a desire to get hold of the speculators in highwines more than the speculators in anything else.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (No. 24) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from the Dalles of Columbia river to a point at or near the mouth of Owyhee river;

A bill (No. 42) in relation to the limitation of actions in certain cases;

A bill (No. 39) to authorize the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir;

A bill (No. 23) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State; and

A bill (No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter K. Caldwell, of Missouri.

INTERNAL REVENUE—AGAIN.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States in 1862 sanctioned this as a legitimate branch of commerce in this country by imposing burdens upon it. They imposed upon it a burden of twenty cents per gallon. And having so sanctioned the commerce, if men, speculators or otherwise, chose to engage in the liquor traffic with the view of making money from it, they had a perfect right to do it. We have a right to manufacture it, and men of means have the same right to purchase it with the view of realizing a profit from its sale.

I see no difference in point of principle or law between a man speculating in highwines and his speculating in gold, flour, grain, pork, or any other article of legitimate merchandise. And why it is that men who have seen fit to invest their means in highwines should be singled out as the particular class upon whom the vengeance of this House is to fall, I cannot conceive. The article has paid its legitimate tax to the Government; and because men have seen fit to invest in it as an article of commerce, is that any legitimate reason for placing such restrictions upon it as shall utterly destroy the manufacturer?

I was asked by my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] a while ago whether if we imposed an increased tax the manufacturer would not be able to sell at a correspondingly higher rate. That as a general rule is true until you reach a point beyond which men will not purchase. I do not know where that point is in the liquor traffic. I do not know that so far as that portion of spirituous liquors is concerned which are drank as a beverage they will be affected by it. I am inclined to think that the more you tax whisky the more will be sold to those who purchase to drink.

But, sir, in reference to that which is not consumed as a beverage, there is a point beyond which if you go you destroy the trade and cut off the Government from all revenue from that source. I do not pretend to say where that point is. I thought the proposition to impose a tax of sixty cents per gallon upon spirituous liquors was an enormous one, and would be so considered by those engaged in the manufacture of them, but I have been told by some of them that they are willing to try it provided you assess no additional tax upon the stock they still have on hand.

They say put what tax you intend to impose upon us on what is hereafter to be manufactured at once, so that we may know what we are to depend upon. Put it as high as you intend to put it, and we will then know how to arrange our business to meet it.

Mr. Speaker, I apprehend if it were not for the fact that a prejudice exists in the minds of some gentlemen as to the use of whisky there would be no controversy on the subject more than there is in regard to other branches of industry. But I implore gentlemen, when they impose a tax upon this article, that they will not fix such a tax as will ruin the men who have embarked their time, their labor, and their capital in this manufacture. But whatever tax the Government shall impose, I implore Congress not to do such gross injustice as to go back and tax what the manufacturers were unfortunate enough to have on hand when the legislation of 22d of February last was proposed. I have information from those who know that if this retroactive tax is imposed upon the stock on hand of these manufacturers, men who have been legitimately engaged in the prosecution of their business, men as honest as are to be found in any other trade, it will destroy many, if not all, of the distilleries of the West. When you destroy them you cut off your entire source of revenue from that quarter merely to get $4,000,000 from half a dozen speculators in whose hands a portion of it may be found.

I know that my friend from New York imagines there is vastly more than two hundred thousand barrels in New York. The statement of the committee as to the quantity is from the best statistical information which could be obtained and from the capacity of the distilleries in the country to furnish it. I think that, therefore, it may be taken at that amount.

My friend from New York stated yesterday that there was one bank in the city of New York that had furnished $250,000 to be invested in this article of whisky alone. Suppose it did. That amount at the price of whisky before his amendment was offered would buy just five thousand barrels, and no more. It will be seen that five thousand barrels is a small proportion of two hundred thousand barrels.

He states further that he knows three men in New York who own one half of the amount estimated to be in existence. Suppose they do. Suppose one man does. If he has the capital he has the right to buy it. Because three men own that amount of the article, is that a reason why they should be wronged? Is that any reason why those who have engaged in this business in the West and risked their money should be wronged? Certainly not. Is there any more reason why three men engaging in the liquor traffic should be wronged than there is that three men engaged in dealing in gold in Wall street should be wronged? Certainly not. It is a legitimate subject of trade. There is no reason in morals or in politics which would induce us to strike down any man, much less when he is engaged in legitimate trade, or engaged in the pursuit of honest industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have no private griefs to avenge. I only look upon this proposition as to the manner in which it is to affect the industry of the country as well as the Government. The more I look into it the more I am convinced that it would be a heavy blow to the distilling interest of the West. It would be wrong, in my judgment, to the distilling interest and unjust to the Government by cutting off the revenue which it would otherwise derive from it. That interest in Illinois is a large one, and it is a large one in the other western States. I have stated the amount manufactured at Peoria and Chicago. There are in other parts of the State of Illinois other establishments capable of making each thirty to fifty barrels a day, at Warsaw, Wesley City, Canton, Pekin, Rock Island, Lucon, Decatur, Danville, Alton, and other points that do not now occur to me, where large amounts are made. It is to the farmers in the vicinity of these establishments an important interest. Railroad rates are so high we cannot send our corn and rye to market over them. The Mississippi river is blockaded, so that we are cut off from that outlet; and to strike down by this tax these markets to our farmers you do us a vast injury.

Sir, it is no small matter that Peoria consumes some ten thousand bushels of corn a day, and that Chicago consumes some six or eight thousand bushels a day. It affords to our people a market for their corn which they could not otherwise have. It enables them to dispose of the products of their labor, and receive its equivalent in cash, to clothe and support their families, and furnish them with the necessities of life. If it were not for this home market, their corn would rot in their cribs for the want of a market. The city of Peoria is now feeding and preparing for the spring market five thousand head of cattle and twenty thousand hogs. The city of Chicago is feeding and preparing for the spring market seven thousand head of cattle; and each one of those other establishments in other portions of the State engaged in this manufacture to a greater or less extent is engaged in feeding cattle and hogs in proportion to its capacity. These afford to us not only a market for our corn and hogs, but they afford to our farmers a market for rye and cattle. As the Government is interested in receiving a revenue out of this manufacture, instead of pursuing such a course of legislation as will destroy it, we should pursue such a course as will stimulate and encourage them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand my colleague to be making an argument on this bill to show that the farmers of Illinois are to be injured by the adoption of the House bill, including the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I suppose it is upon the ground that they will not get so high a price for their corn. I ask the gentleman if the addition of this forty cents a gallon will not enhance the price of whisky to that amount, and consequently enhance the price of the materials, the corn, out of which it is manufactured; and if his argument, in fact, is not opposed to the interest of the farmers of Illinois? The higher the price of whisky is, the greater is the price our farmers get for their corn.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I might answer the gentleman by referring to the prices current of whisky in the city of New York since the House bill, including the amendment of the gentleman from New York, was adopted. If he wants to know the effect of that bill upon prices, he can find it in that. Not only has the price of whisky receded twenty-five cents per gallon, but the price of corn has fallen twenty-five cents in the gentleman's own district.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has not answered my question. I ask my colleague if we advance the tax forty cents, will it not add to the value of the corn which his constituents and my constituents have to sell?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Perhaps the adoption of the Senate amendment, which lays the tax at sixty cents from the passage of the bill to July next, at seventy cents after July and up to January, and after January to eighty cents, may increase the price of whisky and the price of corn. But that amendment does not propose to go back and tax that on hand and which has already paid a tax. Such a course would ruin and bankrupt those who have been engaged in the manufacture. Adopt the House bill, and you destroy them and destroy the market. I do not want to place them in such a situation that they cannot buy the cattle and hogs and corn and rye of our farmers to feed, or make whisky to sell. It is that to which I am objecting, and not to an increased tax upon that which may be manufactured hereafter.

I have endeavored to show, and I flatter myself that I have shown to those who have watched my argument, that the effect of this tax will be to ruin and destroy those manufacturers who have large quantities of this article on hand, owing to what must necessarily follow—a depreciation in the value of their articles, from the fact that their spirits, stock, and grain must be thrown into market and sold. If that is to be the effect, you not only cut off the additional revenue which might be derived from what is manufactured hereafter, but you totally ruin those who have invested their all in this enterprise, and cut off from the farmers of the West the corn market, the grain market, the hog market, and the cattle market that these establishments have afforded. And not only that, sir; each one of these establishments employs a large number of hands. There are two establishments in the city of Peoria that employ upon cooperage alone one hundred and fifty men each, besides those engaged in other departments of these establishments. All these men will be made to feel the effect of this tax if it be imposed. What I desire is so to arrange this tax that these establishments may be enabled to continue running and to yield to this Government a revenue of which, as a citizen of the State, I shall feel proud, and which will be materially felt in the coffers of the nation. If, as I have shown, the cities of Peoria and Chicago will yield to the Government a revenue of nearly twelve million dollars under the Senate bill, it is but reasonable to suppose the establishments in other portions of the State to which I have alluded will greatly augment that amount.

I believe that if you adopt the Senate amendment, if you refuse to stand by the House bill, so as to relieve these men from this additional odious burden of taxation and enable them to prosecute their business, instead of raising the $4,000,000 which you might possibly derive from taxing the stock on hand, the State of Illinois alone will, during the next twelve months, pour into the Treasury $17,000,000. And for these reasons I shall support the Senate amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. It is now very near the usual hour of adjournment, and I will therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. COX. Would the previous question cut off all further amendments?

The SPEAKER. The previous question being called upon the amendments of the Senate generally, cuts off all amendments thereto.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on calling the previous question upon the whole of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been seconded, and the question now is upon ordering the main question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will that bring the House to a vote upon all the amendments at once?

The SPEAKER. It will not; a separate vote can be had upon each amendment; but it precludes the power of amending the amendments of the Senate.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Under what rule is the gentleman from Pennsylvania entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. He is entitled to close the debate, having reported the amendments back from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to hear the gentleman, but I do not think he has any right to be heard, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has; and is confirmed in that opinion by the gentleman before him who understands the parliamentary usage so well.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy the attention of the House but a very short time. I desire to say, in the first place, that a few of the positions taken by the opponents of the Senate bill, or rather by those in favor of the House bill, I think to be founded on mistakes in fact. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has referred to a British statute.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a question of order. Has not the previous question been sustained?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is debate then to go on?

The SPEAKER. It is, on the part of the gentleman who reported back the amendments.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. And nobody else?

The SPEAKER. And nobody else. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to an hour, under the 60th rule.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman understood the British statute of 1860 as imposing an additional tax on the whisky that had been taxed before. Now I have examined that statute and I do not find it to bear the same construction given to it by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] On the contrary, the words of that statute are almost precisely the same used in the House bill as it was first reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. By the English laws certain whisky stored in free warehouses did not pay the excise duty until taken out for consumption. And this statute to which we have been referred was simply that that which had not paid the duty before should be subject to the tax then imposed, and it provided that inasmuch as distillers might have made bargains to deliver on time, the additional tax should fall, not upon them, but upon the merchants, just as the bill of last Congress provided.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania be good enough to read the section of the British statute to which I made special reference, so that the House may consider for itself its character and interpretation?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly, sir. Here is a copy of it. It applied to the stock in the hands of the distiller which had never paid the excise duty; for by the English law it was not bound to pay it until removed for consumption. I therefore think that I was right in saying that the British Government has never relaxed anything that had paid the tax before and bore the stamp. In the case referred to yesterday, it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the payment of duty on imported goods carried with it a license to sell, and that the goods could not be retaxed in a State, as was proposed by the State of Maryland. Now, if the payment of the duty gave the right to sell and traffic in the goods, free from further taxation, on what principle is it that the House bill proceeds?

Mr. WILSON. In the case referred to, the additional tax was sought to be imposed by the State.

Mr. STEVENS. Undoubtedly; but the gentleman from Iowa knows that one of the dicta of the Supreme Court was that the payment of the tax gave a license to sell, so that no further tax could be imposed. If it did give a license to sell, that could not be afterwards affected by the Government either of the United States or of the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like my colleague to say whether there is anything in that decision which authorizes the opinion being entertained or expressed that the Supreme Court decided that Congress could not exercise the power?

Mr. STEVENS. It was that a State should not. But I am speaking of a dictum, of the opinion of one of the judges. That, I think, authorizes us to infer that when a tax is once paid it carries with it full license to sell without retaxation.

Mr. VOORHEES. As I did not have the opinion at my desk yesterday, I will, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, read some points from it.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. I read from the decision in the Maryland case:

"Commerce is intercourse; one of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic." * * * "To what purpose should the power to allow importation be given, unaccompanied with the power to authorize a sale of the thing imported? Sale is the object of importation."

Now, if you will let "manufacture" stand for "importation," you will have a case exactly analogous.

Mr. STEVENS. That is not necessary; because we provide here also for taxing all liquors imported forty cents a gallon additional.

Mr. VOORHEES, (continuing to read:)

"We think, then, that if the power to authorize a sale exists in Congress, the conclusion that the right to sell is connected with the law permitting importation as an inseparable incident is inevitable."

Mr. STEVENS. Undoubtedly that is the true doctrine, and the only doctrine on which the faith of the Government can be sustained.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the point in that case goes beyond this, that the State has no authority to interfere by taxation or other means with the exclusive exercise of the power of the General Government to regulate commerce?

Mr. STEVENS. That was the point before the court; but I speak of the reasoning of the judge, that goes to the full extent that I have already stated, and so the reasoning of the gentleman from Indiana shows.

Now, sir, I understand the gentleman from Iowa, behind me, [Mr. Kasson], to advance the extraordinary doctrine that our tax of twenty cents per gallon, of last year, did what? Only gave the distiller permission to distill the whisky, but not to offer it for sale. So he was reported and so I understood him: an excellent doctrine for this House! We have the right, by the doctrine of the gentleman, to catch it the moment it is distilled, and put another tax upon it before he has permission to sell it.

Mr. KASSON. I ask my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, as the previous question will prevent me from replying, to give me permission to explain what my position was.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that my proposition was this, in distinction from the opinion the gentleman says I advanced; I say that we licensed the distiller by virtue of the original provision in the bill of the last Congress, requiring him to pay a tax of twenty cents per gallon, to manufacture and sell or remove for consumption.

My further position was, that after it had been sold by him, it became the property of the country and was liable to further taxation by the State or national Government. Under the former law he had unquestionably the right to sell. I stated distinctly that I did not desire the retroactive operation of this law, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania did; that I did not desire it to go back to the 12th of January last, but that it should go into effect from and after the passage of this act.

Certainly, we have a right to revise the action of the last Congress, and authorize a higher rate of duty to be levied for the coming year than was imposed the previous year. I did not take position that the manufacturer had no right to sell under the present law. He may sell to-day what he produced yesterday, and he may sell to-morrow what he produces to-day. But if, when the law goes into effect, he has an accumulated stock on hand, which he has withheld from the market, the same rule will apply to him that applies after the passage of any other act. I do not propose that the bill shall be retroactive in its effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I find from the report of the gentleman's speech, as published, that he took the broad ground that the twenty cents per gallon of the last session only licenses the distiller to manufacture. And if he sees fit to keep it on hand for six months, according to this doctrine you may tax him twenty cents more a gallon for keeping it on hand; at the end of six months more, you may tax him another twenty cents, because he has not sold it, and so on as long as he continues to keep it, you increase the tax. Sir, it is a monstrous doctrine, and as absurd as it is monstrous.

Now, sir, from what examination I have been able to give to the British laws referred to, I undertake to say that no manufactured article that has once paid a tax is required to pay it a second time.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the difference in principle between taxing the manufacturer of whisky for his accumulated stock at the end of the year, because he has it on hand, and taxing me for my carriage because I have it on hand?

Mr. STEVENS. Because in one case you tax the use of an article, and in the other you tax an article that has not been used. When you tax a carriage for the use of it last year, and again for its use this year, you do not tax the same thing twice, but if you tax a man for a drink and then tax him the next year for the same thing, it involves an entirely different principle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him this question? I believe the act of last year contains a provision looking to the prospective taxation of landed property; now, where is the difference in principle between taxing the same liquors a second time and the taxation of vacant and unimproved land?

Mr. STEVENS. I mean to say that when you tax land you tax an article that is substantial and permanent, that is used and to be used by the farmer, and the principle is very different from the taxation of a mere article of commerce which when once used has no more value.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to another portion of the decision to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] referred. The court in this case says:

"It certainly cannot be maintained that the States have no authority to tax imported merchandise. But the same principle of discrimination between the wholesale and retail dealers as to a license to sell, would seem to me, if well founded, to extend to taxes of every description. And it would present a singular incongruity to exempt a wholesale merchant from all taxes upon his stock of goods, and subject to taxation the like stock of his neighbor who was selling by retail."

"It is laid down in No. 32 of the Federalist, and I believe universally admitted, that the States, with the sole exception of duties on imports and exports, retain authority to tax in the most absolute and unqualified sense; and any attempt on the part of the national Government to abridge them in the exercise of it would be a violent assumption of power unwarranted by any article or clause of the Constitution. Although an impost or duty may be considered a tax in its most enlarged sense, yet every tax cannot be understood to mean an impost or duty in the sense of the Constitution."

The point decided is that the States could not lay an impost duty upon goods which had been imported, and they did not decide that a State could not tax in the hands of the importer. As my colleague says they decided that broken packages may be taxed. The same principle applies here, that the General Government may levy this tax upon the property in the hands of the importer or in the hands of the manufacturer.

Mr. VOORHEES. The case cited and read from by the gentleman is precisely this case under the act of the Maryland Legislature proposing, after the duty had been paid on the articles, to make the holder pay a license.

Mr. WILSON. Before he could sell?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir; before he could sell. Now, what is this forty cents you propose to make them pay additional, what is this twenty cents for? For the privilege of selling. So this additional tax is for the privilege of selling. The privilege once bought, the question is whether you can come in afterwards and charge an additional sum in order to enable him to enjoy the same privilege. There is the whole case.

Mr. WILSON. In order to get at the precise case, I will refer to the syllabus. It is there declared that a State law requiring an importer to take a license and pay fifty dollars before he should be permitted to sell a package of imported goods, is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits a State from laying any impost, &c.; and also with the clause which declares that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce, &c.

Mr. VOORHEES. By reading the act of the Legislature of Maryland, it will be seen how correctly I have stated it.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose from the syllabus I have referred to that this has nothing to do with the question before the House. That is all I have to say.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I contend, as

I contended before when this House had the subject under examination and discussion, that Congress had imposed a tax that they declared to be prospective. They inaugurated the internal revenue by saying that in no case should they look to retroactive taxation. When they passed that they authorized every man in the land to manufacture his goods on that principle. I say then that it is faithless in this Congress to assume any other ground. I will not deny the question that the Government has the power to do wrong, but I hope that it will do right. I say, therefore, to attempt to ~~tax~~ production brought into existence under the act of Congress is faithless and ought not to receive our sanction.

I now take it simply on the question of revenue. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fernando Wood] to be extremely solicitous that the Government shall have revenue to support its expenses. The gentleman behind me says that he wants revenue but is opposed to the Senate amendment. It did not surprise me when the gentleman from New York took that ground. I know with what fidelity he voted for that bill.

A MEMBER. He voted against it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to say why I voted against the bill?

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield. The gentleman expected to catch me in a trap. I want to say that the revenue raised by the House bill is $2,000,000 less than what will be raised by the Senate amendment for the first year, and every subsequent year it will be $14,000,000 less.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and also that it had insisted upon its disagreement to the House amendment to the enrollment bill, agreed to the committee of conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Messrs. Wilson, Grimes, and Nesmith managers of said conference on its part.

INTERNAL REVENUE—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. When I have shown, as a question of revenue, that the Senate bill is far preferable to the House bill, I am quite sure the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fernando Wood] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] will go with us and support the Senate amendment. Let us look at it. By the House bill an additional tax of forty cents is to be laid on all that is on hand. I have said before that I thought not more than half of it would be collected, amounting to $2,000,000; but suppose we collect the whole, it will be $4,000,000.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether I understand him that the twenty cents paid by the distiller is to cover for all time to come the liquor he distilled?

Mr. STEVENS. It covers all he had distilled under that law, and covers it for all time to come.

Mr. PRICE asked another question, which was entirely inaudible to the reporters.

Mr. STEVENS. No man ever supposed, and the gentleman is too intelligent to suppose, that a manufacture is to pay more than once. A manufacture pays but once, and there is no exception to that rule, unless you make this an exception, in order to punish the manufacture of whisky.

Mr. PRICE. Do not other manufactured articles pay a tax once a year?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; they pay a tax of three per cent.; and when they have paid it they have paid it forever.

Mr. PIKE. I inquire whether some articles were not taxed every year?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes; for the use of them, such as carriages and plate; but not for their manufacture.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, by the revenue bill to which this bill is virtually an amendment—the bill of July, 1862—the raw material, iron and sugar, for instance, a tax is not imposed upon them; and whether, after they are manufactured, an additional tax is not imposed?

Mr. STEVENS. Wherever the committee could discriminate and lay the tax upon the additional value they did so. There are many cases where that cannot be done. But all taxes which were paid once are deducted from the income tax, and they are never paid a second time. Such was the law of 1862.

But I was proceeding, when interrupted, to show that the Senate bill would produce more revenue than the House bill. I said the whole tax upon the stock supposed to be on hand, provided you could collect it all—which I doubt very much—would amount to $4,000,000. You would get at once those $4,000,000. After that you would get by the House bill for one year sixty cents on, say, seventy million gallons, which would make $42,000,000. Thus you would get under the House bill the first year, including the tax on that on hand, $46,000,000.

Now how will it be under the amendment of the Senate? During the first four months we would get the sixty cents, the same as we will under the House bill. Twenty-three million gallons is the proportion which will be manufactured the first four months. That would produce $13,800,000. For the next six months, from July to January, the tax will be seventy cents. The amount manufactured during that time will be thirty-five million gallons, and will pay, at seventy cents, $24,000,000. We have now disposed of ten months. During the two months after the 1st of January the tax will be eighty cents, and the amount manufactured will be twelve million gallons, and will produce $9,600,000 of revenue.

Within the year, then, under the Senate bill, we would get $47,900,000, while under the House bill, including the tax on that on hand collected to the utmost extent, we would get $46,000,000, making $1,900,000 more revenue collected under the Senate bill than under the House bill; admitting, as I said before, that you could collect the whole upon that on hand.

How will it be after the first year? After that, every year the House bill would produce the sum of $42,000,000, and the Senate bill, at eighty cents per gallon, would produce $56,000,000, making $14,000,000 more under the Senate bill than under the House bill.

Now I ask gentlemen under these circumstances to give me some other reason than that it is revenue that is wanted, before they insist upon the House bill. And yet, notwithstanding the Senate bill produces for all time to come $14,000,000 more a year, and $1,900,000 for the first year, the distillers do not object to the increased tax, because they have time to accommodate themselves to this change.

I hold in my hand a paper signed by seventy-two of the principal distillers in the United States, in which they tell us not to tax the stock on hand, but they do not object to the increased tax proposed in the Senate bill.

Mr. WILSON. I would inquire of the gentleman whether if the bill should be sent to a committee of conference we cannot get the increased tax provided for by the Senate amendment and also retain the tax on the stock on hand, and thereby increase the amount of revenue beyond what is now provided for?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman knows that there is an old saying that if the sky falls you can catch larks. [Laughter.] I cannot tell what might be done by a committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman if what I have suggested is not true?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman knows as well as I do what a committee of conference can do, and so, I presume, does every gentleman here.

I ask gentlemen who are in favor of revenue to consider this question; I ask gentlemen who are in favor of maintaining the pledged faith of the Government to consider this question; and I ask that we shall not run the risk of having the bill so monstrously framed that we shall tax again what we have already taxed, thus breaking down the present manufacturers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understand my colleague, he supposes that the production will be unimpaired by the Senate's amendment. I desire, in this connection, to ask him what was the effect on the production of the passage of the existing law and what was the amount of revenue which that law yielded?

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the law in one year yielded about four million dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would indicate a production of about eight million gallons.

Mr. STEVENS. It is ascertained that the production last year was about sixty million gallons, but for various reasons the tax was not collected on the whole amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the production was reduced by the operation of the law from sixty million to eight million gallons.

Mr. STEVENS. No, the gentleman does not so understand me, because the gentleman can understand what a man says. I said that the ascertained production was sixty million gallons, but that only $4,000,000 was collected owing to evasions of the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what was the effect of the existing law upon production. Now, I can tell him that, so far as New York is concerned, the passage of that law stopped every distillery in my district for six months, and there were no operations in that district in the way of manufacturing spirits until it was anticipated that the necessities of the country would require a new tax upon spirits hereafter to be manufactured.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether the effect which he now states was not owing to the fact that no tax was levied upon the stock on hand, and that they had all crowded on their distilleries to their utmost capacity so as to manufacture stock enough to last through the first year?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. They have made no money except it was in anticipation of the imposition of an increased tax by the Government, from which they supposed they would have derived a profit, and that they had a right to suppose.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I cannot give way further to anybody. I will say to my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] that although a sudden tax may check for a certain time the manufacture of this article, yet when you once lay it on and let the manufacturers know how it is to be, I do not think any tax you can lay upon whisky would stop the manufacture of it to any great extent. I know that if you were to break up the manufactories now it would not be six months before they would be in operation again, but that is not what I propose to do. It has been shown in England that that has not been the effect of the tax, and I do not suppose that will be the effect in this country if the manufacturers can have any assurance that there is a design and a disposition on the part of Congress to keep faith with them and with the country.

And now, Mr. Speaker, for fear somebody else should ask me another question, I will sit down and let the vote be taken on the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] having demanded a separate vote on each amendment, they will be considered in their order.

Mr. COX (at twenty-five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

First amendment of the Senate:

In section one, after the word "or," insert the words "distilled and," so that it will read:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

After the last amendment insert the words "previous to the 1st day of July next."

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Add the following:

And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS, and HARRIS of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-one.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Blow, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Eliot, English, Fenton, Garfield, Higby, Hooper, Kelley, Francis W. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—106.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BAXTER stated that he had paired off with Mr. BLAINE, who would have voted to concur in the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, stated that Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, had been detained by illness yesterday and to-day.

Mr. DRIGGS stated that he had paired off with Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio.

Mr. KASSON stated that he had agreed to pair off with Mr. MORRILL, who not being well was obliged to leave the House.

Mr. BAXTER stated that Mr. WOODBRIDGE was detained at home by illness in his family.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Fourth amendment:

Strike out the following:

And all whisky or any other spirit, on being rectified or mixed with any other spirit or fluid whatever, or into which any matter whatever may be infused, and to be sold as whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, or by any other name, and not otherwise provided for by this act, or the act to which it is amendatory, shall pay an additional tax of twenty cents per gallon.

Mr. SMITH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH and A. MYERS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, nays 54.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Strike out the following:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. So the amendment was concurred in.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BAXTER stated that Mr. BLAINE, with whom he was paired, would have voted for it and he would have voted against it.

Mr. BOYD stated that although he had received petitions from St. Louis and Jefferson City in favor of the Senate amendment, he would follow his own conscience, judgment, and reflection, and vote "no."

Mr. KASSON stated that if he had not been paired off with Mr. MORRILL he would have voted "no."

The result was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate for a sliding scale tax on liquors—the third amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote last taken; and move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to reconsider the vote by which the third amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he allow the vote on that motion to go over until we have disposed of the other Senate amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I see no reason why the vote may not as well be taken now as at any time; and I therefore call for it now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The House divided on the latter motion; and there were—ayes 45, noes 81.

Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House thereupon (at twenty minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented the memorial of Charles F. Anderson respecting the cause of the bad ventilation of the Senate Chamber, and suggesting a mode of remedying the alleged defects; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying that a pension be granted to Margaret M. Stafford, widow of Reuben Stafford, who was killed while assisting the provost marshal at New Bedford, Coshocton county, in that State, in arresting deserters; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the sale of the mineral lands of the Rocky mountain country, and that aid may be granted for the construction of the Northern and Central Pacific railroads; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of Francis, Robert P., and Allen Dodge, trustees of Charles Dodge and Sylvanus Mott, of New York, praying for compensation for the schooner Fairfax, taken to shield the United States steamer Resolute, and which was destroyed while being so used; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Laura M. Newcomb, of Providence, Rhode Island, widow of the late Commander Henry S. Newcomb, United States Navy, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to present the petition of Daniel Parker and others, volunteers in the first regiment Illinois cavalry, asking pay for horses lost at the time of the capture of our forces at Lexington, in the State of Missouri. These petitioners set forth that they furnished their own horses, and that without any fault of theirs, by the casualties of war, their horses were captured at the surrender of Lexington, while they were under Colonel Mulligan, and they have not been able to obtain pay for them. They have presented their claims to the proper Department of the Government, and they have been answered that they could not be paid without further legislation. I trust that the petition will receive the favorable consideration of the committee to which I move to refer it—the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition signed in behalf of the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of the United States by a committee, in which they ask Congress to amend the Constitution of the United States so that it shall contain a distinct recognition of the authority of God, of Christ as the Governor among nations, and of the Scriptures as the supreme law of the land; also to remove from the Constitution all pro-slavery concessions and compromises, and introduce in their place a section declaring that henceforth there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except for crime in any State or Territory of the United States. I also offer a memorial of a similar character from a mass convention of Christian people, without distinction of sect or denomination, which was held at Allegheny City, Pennsylvania, on the 27th and 28th of January last. I ask their reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The memorials were so referred.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relative to the claim on this Government of the owners of the French ship La Manche, and recommending an appropriation for the satisfaction of the claim pursuant to the award of the arbitrators; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes; and the bill (S. No. 89) in relation to proceedings in the courts of the United States, now before the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 46) to remove doubts on the construction of the joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution directing them to consider the propriety of repealing the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, explanatory of the confiscation act, particularly in regard to the forfeiture of real estate beyond the life of the offender, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, recommending the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara on the American side, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration in accordance with their universal rule not to print memorials.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Moses Kelly, administrator of Major W. W. Russell, deceased, late paymaster in the United States marine corps, praying for certain allowances in the settlement of Major Russell's accounts, have instructed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition. They think it is not a matter that comes within their jurisdiction; and I further move that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers, so that he can send them elsewhere.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 96) to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 97) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 117) to provide for the consolidation of certain surveyor generals' districts, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 21) granting land to the State of Kansas to indemnify her citizens for losses, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on discharging the committee.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to have time to consider that question. That is a bill in which my constituents are very deeply interested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go upon the Calendar if the Senator desires it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to oppose the report of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go upon the Calendar.

NOAH WISWALL.

Mr. FOOT. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall, direct me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. The claim is a small one, and in the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Public Lands a very just one, and the committee therefore directs me to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its consideration now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its object is to direct the proper accounting officers to audit an account between the United States and the legal representatives of Noah Wiswall, assignee of Daniel Chilson, for the amount of purchase money paid by Chilson on the 13th of July, 1835, by his agent, Amariah Watson, to J. W. Stevenson, receiver of public moneys at Galena, Illinois, per receipt No. 1282, for eighty acres of the west half of the southwest quarter of section No. 15, in township No. 16 north, of range No. 8 east, of the fourth principal meridian, at the rate of $1.25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay the amount, upon such adjustment, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print additional copies of General McClellan's report without the accompanying maps and documents, to report the same back to the Senate with an amendment, with a recommendation that it pass. The amendment reduces the number from ten thousand to five thousand. Five thousand have already been ordered to be printed. I am also instructed to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "five thousand;" so that it will read:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the McClellan report, without the accompanying maps and documents, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Interior Department, five hundred copies of the report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct.

CENSUS STATISTICS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution, accompanied by a written statement; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the Census be required to prepare for the Senate statistical tables expressing in full the population of the United States, classing according to the hydrographic divisions of North America, as arranged in the accompanying article. Also, the relative industrial occupations of the population in each hydrographic subdivision, distinguishing the rural from the town populations. Also, the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial statistics of each, expressed in aggregate totals, specifying the population of each county or part of county, city, &c.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 121) donating public lands to the several States for the support and education of the orphan children of soldiers and sailors who die in the military and naval service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARDING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Mary A. Baker, widow of Brigadier General Edward D. Baker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 123) to abolish slavery throughout all the States and Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 124) to amend the act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 16) with a view to make it the special order for a future day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senate that this is the joint resolution introduced at an early day of the session by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENPSON], and to which the Committee on the Judiciary have proposed an amendment, to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit slavery throughout the United States, and in all places within its jurisdiction. I move that the resolution be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SUMNER subsequently said: I ask the consent of the Senate to offer an amendment, which I propose to move on Monday next to the joint resolution to amend the Constitution which was made the order of the day for that day at one o'clock, and I desire to have it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received and the order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

ALBERT BROWN.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate now take up for consideration a bill that has been before them two or three times for the relief of Albert Brown.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The impression of the Chair is that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] is entitled to the floor on this bill; he was addressing the Chair when it went over before.

Mr. HOWE. I had concluded what I had to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Foster] to send the bill and accompanying papers to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SAULSBURY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I would not say a word on this subject, but as I know the whole case I feel exceedingly unwilling that it should take the course proposed, for this reason: I think that no one who will examine the facts in the case can have the slightest doubt that the Government of this country owe this man honestly every dollar that the Committee on Claims have reported, just as clearly, as the Senator from Wisconsin said, as if they had given their bond to pay it.

This man I know. He is a constituent of mine, a highly respectable mechanic; and the inspector that was agreed upon by the parties to inspect these wagons in the course of their construction, and when they were done, is one of the most respectable men in my State. He was originally a mechanic, perfectly conversant with the business, and a man against whose reputation I never heard the breath of suspicion uttered. He has been a member of our Legislature in both its branches, and is a man as much respected as any man in the State. He was agreed upon by the quartermaster's department to inspect the work while it was in progress. He did inspect it. He was the man agreed upon by the parties, and the work was made out to his acceptance.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say to the Senator that the claimant here had nothing to do with the appointment of this man. It was agreed that the Government might appoint the inspector, and the Government did appoint him.

Mr. HALE. That makes the case stronger. It was agreed that the Government should appoint an inspector, and they appointed Mr. Patten, as respectable a man as is to be found in the State of New Hampshire or any other State of the Union; a man whose character for fairness and integrity is unimpeached and unimpeachable. He lived in the neighborhood; he inspected the wagons in the course of their construction, and inspected them after they were done; and they were delivered to the Government to all intents and purposes according to the terms of the contract; and the Government took them and transported them to Perryville, in Maryland, some four or five hundred miles away from Mr. Brown's residence. When they got there, another inspector then overhauled them, and reported that they were not fit, when he did not know anything about what Brown had contracted to do. He was not authorized to inspect them, and had not the contract before him.

There was this man who had made these wagons honestly, in exact accordance with the provisions of his contract, and they were accepted by the Government and transported four hundred miles away from his workshop, and then the Government undertook to throw them on to his hands. It seems to me that a clearer case never could be presented to the justice, if not the equity, of the Government; and if this be so, why should he be sent to the Court of Claims? Why should he not have this money? I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I believe the motion is to refer this matter to the Court of Claims. I desire that the Senate will give me their attention for a few moments while I attempt to show, as I think I can show, that it should not go to the Court of Claims.

This man Brown is not a person who sought a contract from the Government, but the Government sought him. When this rebellion broke out, and about the 1st of July, 1861, the Government needed wagons. They sent an assistant quartermaster into my State to some experienced wagon-builders at Concord, New Hampshire, men of a good deal of reputation, to procure the building of certain wagons; the Government needed a hundred wagons in sixty days. The parties to whom the quartermaster applied said that they could not build these wagons, they were so employed, but they recommended the quartermaster to this man Brown, who was then a member of our Legislature. The quartermaster thereupon went to the Legislature and called out Mr. Brown, told him what the Government needed, that they needed very much to have one hundred wagons in sixty days. Mr. Brown said to the quartermaster that he did not believe he could build the wagons unless the Government would give him more time. The Government were urgent for the wagons, and the quartermaster persuaded Mr. Brown to bid for the wagons at some rate. He did bid for the wagons at a price of $141 apiece, which was a reasonable price, but on condition that the Government would give him more time. The quartermaster insisted that he must have the wagons within sixty days, and he requested Mr. Brown to go home to Kingston, where he lived, look over the stock he had on hand, examine and confer with his workmen, and see if he could not do it within the sixty days, and then meet the quartermaster at Portland, where he was going.

Mr. Brown assented. He went home and looked over his lumber; he looked over his stock on hand; he called his workmen together, and told them what the Government wanted, and said to them, "Now, can we build these wagons for the Government in the time, forty of them in thirty and the rest in sixty days?" The men said they would take hold for the Government. Mr. Brown thereupon went to Portland, saw the quartermaster, and told him that he would undertake to build these wagons for the Government in sixty days if they would give him an inspector to inspect the work as it went along. Thereupon they concluded the contract. The Government agreed to give him an inspector, and gave him an inspector who was a wagon-maker himself, who had been a mechanic, but by intelligence and skill worked himself up to be a lawyer, and had been a member of both branches of our Legislature, a man of unimpeachable integrity.

Mr. Brown went along with all the force he could command, and in the sixty days he turned out his wagons and he had them inspected. His contract was that when the railroad company gave him a receipt for the wagons that should be a complete delivery. He delivered his wagons according to the order of the Government and took his railroad receipt. What has been the result? Up to this time—more than two years—he has not got a farthing of pay, and you now propose to send him to the Court of Claims, where he must wait a year longer. His interest on this claim already amounts to $2,100, and yet you will not give him a farthing for it.

When these wagons got to Perryville, the Government put an inspector upon them to inspect them over again. I do not know that Sawtelle was ever appointed inspector, though he undertook to inspect the wagons. He inspected the wagons and made report. Upon seeing that report, Mr. Brown was entirely satisfied that it was wrong, and he said to him it was wrong, and told him if he would go and see the wagons with him he would show him it was wrong. In that first report Sawtelle reported that the covering of the wagons, the canvas, was entirely too small and would not go on, and could not be used. Mr. Brown went and showed him the wagons and told him he had not pulled the bows down into their places, but if he would pull the bows down and put the covering on, he would see that it was all right. He thereupon did it, and then Sawtelle reported that the wagons were good for nothing except the covering, and that was very good.

A SENATOR. Who is Sawtelle?

Mr. CLARK. Sawtelle is a quartermaster in the Army; I think he ranks as a captain or major. I find no fault with Mr. Sawtelle; I only desire to do justice to this man; but I want to say further that when the last inspection was going on, Mr. Sawtelle complained that the wagons were made of unsound wood. "Why," said Mr. Brown, "you cannot tell that; they have all been painted; but I will tell you what I will do: you may take a chisel and chisel out of any place here where it is unsound, and if it is unsound I will lose the wagon." "Agreed," said Mr. Sawtelle. They took the chisel and chiseled it out, and here is the piece of wood which Mr. Sawtelle said was unsound—[exhibiting a round piece of wood]—as hard as a brick.

Mr. JOHNSON. That made it unsound. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. That made it unsound undoubtedly, when they chiseled it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Too hard. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. Too hard a case for Brown, a great deal. Here this man has been waiting for two years, losing interest amounting to $2,100 for undertaking to do what the Government wanted him to do, what they went to his home and besought him to do, and still you want to send him to the Court of Claims after his claim has been twice examined by a committee of the Senate. Does any Senator on this statement, if it is true, desire that? And if it is not true I wish to have it contradicted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, my attention was called to this claim by seeing the report on my table. It appears to me to be a very clear demand upon the Government, and one which the character of the Government, in my judgment, requires should be disposed of at once, without any delay, assuming the facts stated in the report to be true, as I do, and they are confirmed by the statement made by both the honorable members from New Hampshire. The contract under which these wagons were constructed was entered into on the 1st July, 1861:

"The wagons, boxes, &c., are to be stored at Kingston, New Hampshire."

I read now a portion of the contract—

"at such place as the quartermaster or his agent may designate, and the contractor to assist in taking them apart for shipping. It is agreed that forty of the wagons, complete, shall be ready for delivery on or before the 31st day of July, and the remainder on the 31st day of August, 1861."

"The evidence in the case shows that on the day of the date of the contract Major Miller?"

who represented the Government in getting the contract made—

"appointed Mr. W. C. Patten, of Kingston, the agent of the department to inspect the wagons, instructing him, at the same time, in writing, how to inspect, and what sort of a certificate to give."

The party, therefore, who was to pass upon the wagons was one selected by the Government with the consent of the contractor; and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary—and there is, as I understand, no evidence to the contrary—we are bound to presume that the person selected was competent to discharge this particular duty. It is not pretended, as I understand, that there was any fraud as between the contractor and Patten, the inspector. No collusion is pretended. Brown acted honestly. Patten, the inspector, acted honestly; and he gave the certificate that he was authorized to give by the terms of his appointment. But before that was done, Major Miller, who was still the representative of the Government, wrote to Brown this letter:

"Sir: The wagons to be manufactured under your contract with the United States of this date should be shipped, when ordered by the Quartermaster General, on bills of lading or railroad receipts taken in duplicate."

And the order, of course, was not to be given until they passed the inspection. They did pass the inspection. They were ordered to be shipped, and Brown, by the terms of the letter of Major Miller, was bound to ship them, and he did ship them in good faith, and they arrived at their place of destination. When they arrived there they were subjected to another inspection, not by the man who was originally appointed, but by some other person appointed by the Quartermaster General; and because his inspection differed in its result from the inspection made by their own selected inspector, they have refused to pay Mr. Brown.

All that I have to say is, that if this was a dispute as between individuals, I do not think any lawyer could be persuaded to make a defense, with or without a fee. When I say that Brown is to be supposed to be honest, and Patten is to be supposed to be honest, I say it, not only because there is nothing to prove the contrary, and they are entitled to all the inferences that the law draws in a case of this description, but they are both from New Hampshire, and of course they must have been honest. I submit, therefore, that it is not a case that should go to the Court of Claims any way.

Mr. NESMITH. I have no desire to do any injustice to the claimant in this case, and perhaps he is entitled to something, but I do not think he is entitled to the amount which is provided for by this bill. The bill appropriates $15,000 for which the Government has never had any sort of consideration whatever.

It seems that a contract was made by this Government with Mr. Brown for the manufacture and delivery of a certain number of Army wagons.

Lawyers, I admit, may very readily make out of it a case which between individuals would perhaps bind them. It appears that a Mr. Patten, a gentleman of multifarious occupations, as has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, a member of the Legislature, a lawyer, and at some time a wagon-maker, was selected by the quartermaster, Major Miller, and the contractor to inspect and pass upon these wagons. It seems they were built and were forwarded to the quartermaster at Perryville, who was then Captain (now Colonel) Sawtelle, of the quartermaster's department of the Army. When the wagons reached Sawtelle he saw that they were unfit for the service, that they were worthless, that the putty which had been placed to fill up the interstices caused by the worthless, rotten timber of which they were made was about falling out of them; and that the wagons if loaded and sent to the front were liable to break down and become worthless at any time. He, therefore, as an honest man and the representative of the Government, thought it was his duty to prevent the Government from being swindled, and refused to accept the wagons. He was on the ground; he was the quartermaster to whom the wagons were delivered, and who was to load them and send them to the front, and who was responsible for receiving property of that kind.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire simply where and how he ascertained that Mr. Sawtelle made these discoveries that the putty was falling out of the wagons, and that they were made of rotten wood?

Mr. NESMITH. I do not take the statement of Captain Sawtelle for that fact. The statement is made to me by parties whom I understand to be reliable. The statement that the wagons were not constructed in accordance with the contract, that the workmanship of them was bad, that there was rotten and bad timber in them, comes from two master wheelwrights who were in the employment of Sawtelle, who were directed by him to make a critical inspection of the wagons. They did make that inspection, and they made a report setting forth some eighteen reasons why the wagons did not comply with the contract made for them by the Government, and in which they were deficient.

This report of the Committee on Claims undertakes to make out a case of condemnation against the quartermaster's department. It seems to be designed more for that purpose than to vindicate the claim of Mr. Brown. It is very easy for gentlemen who have claims against the Government to appear before the committees, without any rebutting testimony, and make a fair showing of a case. I do not undertake or pretend to say that the committee acted improperly in this matter; but I do undertake to say that in their report there is more of condemnation against the department than there is in favor of the payment of this claim.

They undertake to say that this man, Mr. Patten, and the contractor were both men of good moral character, upright, honest men; and that they submitted proofs of that sort to the committee. Why, sir, there is not a man in this country who has a contract with the Government who could not appear before one of your committees and make it appear that he is the pink of propriety, that he is upright and honest, and that his inspector was an upright and honest man.

There is an implied attack upon Captain Sawtelle in this report. It says that while those men were of that sort of character there is no evidence before the committee that Captain Sawtelle was a man of good character or a man whom the committee were entitled to believe. Captain Sawtelle is a quartermaster, an officer of ten years' standing in the Army. The proofs of his character are that he has been confirmed two or three times by the Senate. If the committee had desired to ascertain whether he was a man of such a character as could not be believed in his statements and his official reports, there was abundant testimony within their reach to prove what sort of a man he was. I have known Captain Sawtelle for years. I know he is an upright, honest, honorable gentleman, and a competent officer. I know that he would not descend to do a wrong thing, and the evidences before the committee and before the Senate are that it was not his interest to do it. If, as is alleged against quartermasters and against officers who make purchases for the Navy, bribery and bonuses are resorted to for the purpose of getting bad and worthless property accepted, there might be some reason why Captain Sawtelle might be suspected of having been bribed to do a thing of this kind, but, on the contrary, all his acts go to repel any such idea; and he rejected the wagons. If he had received the wagons, worthless as they were, there might have been some charge of that character brought against him.

The report has several negative points of that kind which I do not propose to examine at length. It goes on to say:

"Besides, there is evidence in the case which shows that Mr. Potter is an experienced wagon-builder. There is no evidence to show that Captain Sawtelle ever made one."

Now, sir, a man who is a quartermaster in the United States Army, though he may never have built wagons, who has crossed the plains, as Captain Sawtelle has done—a journey which is the best possible test of a wagon—and who has had several years' experience in the quartermaster's department in the use of wagons, I apprehend is every way competent to determine the value of a wagon or the propriety of adopting it for use in the service. As I said before, the inducements would have been all in favor of Sawtelle's receiving the wagons, if they were worthless. I think in a case of this sort where an officer exercises an authority of that kind, and rejects worthless property, in place of condemning and denouncing him by a report and fixing an implied aspersion on his character for doing a thing which protects the Government, we should protect the character of the officer who does it. As I said before, Captain Sawtelle is an honorable, high-minded, upright gentleman; and if I thought it would not be an equivocal compliment to him I would say that I believe he is as honest as any member of Congress. [Laughter.]

It was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] the other day that the statements of Captain Sawtelle were uncorroborated. I am in favor of referring this claim to the Court of Claims, in order that that corroboration may be had, and that all the facts in connection with it may be investigated. The wagons were refused by the Government. I understand they were subsequently sold by order of the railroad company that transported them, in order to pay the freight, for about thirty dollars apiece, about the value of the iron. The wagons were never used, were never accepted by the Government, and were subsequently sold by the railroad company for the payment of the freight; and consequently, if $15,000 is paid this claimant, the Government receives no consideration for the money.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Clark] went on to state in reference to the soundness of these wagons that a piece was chiseled out of one of them, and that proved to be sound. It strikes me that if this claim is paid the Government will be chiseled more than the wagons were. [Laughter.]

There is scarcely a day here but some officer of this Government is denounced and condemnation heaped upon him for buying or receiving property that is worthless. We hear it almost every day in relation to the quartermaster's department; and we all well recollect how eloquent and indignant the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hale] was, during the last Congress, on account of the purchase of worthless ships for our Navy. He never ceased denouncing those acts. We recollect, when he had given up the idea of getting justice from Congress or from the Government on that subject, how he appealed from Congress to the Almighty, and what his solemn invocation was, as, in the exuberance of his indignant piety, he raised his hands and his eyes to heaven and exclaimed, "O Christ, who with a whip of small cords didst drive the money-changers from the temple of Jerusalem, is there no scourge to lash the backs of those who would turn this temple of our liberties into a den of thieves?" [Laughter.] That was the most eloquent prayer, I think, that was ever offered up to these galleries, [laughter,] and during the thirty years that I have sat under the droppings of the sanctuary I have heard nothing to equal it. It did honor to the head and the heart of the Senator from New Hampshire, and it would have been worthy of an Army chaplain. [Laughter.]

I referred a few moments since to a report which was made to Captain Sawtelle by the inspectors in his employ whom he authorized to examine these wagons. I will read their report:

"These forty wagons vary from the specifications of the contract in the following particulars:

"1. All the hounds are too crooked, cutting across the grain so as to leave no strength in them.

"2. The slider bar is bolted on the under side of the hound, and does not touch the coupling pole by two inches, and cannot be made to do so without bending the king-bolt.

"3. The king-bolt is only one and one eighth inch, and holes in the plates for it to pass through the same, so that the wagon cannot rock without breaking it.

"4. There are no clips on the ends of the axle stocks to secure the stocks to the axle. The stocks of the axles carry the full size to the end, which butts against the hub, so that there is no room for the sand band to project over the hub, and there is nothing to keep the dirt from working into the box.

"5. The rubber plate on the coupling poles and the lock plates on the bodies are fastened with nails instead of rivets, as they should be.

"6. The back hounds, beside the fault mentioned above, are six inches too short.

"7. The tongues will not fit any other wagons, being half an inch too wide.

"8. The wheels are bad; the boxes all being loose, many of the hubs rotten, and showing unmistakable evidence of very inferior workmanship throughout.

"9. The middle clevis and tall plate are not let in level with the floor, so as to admit the sliding of boxes and barrels. There are no front corner plates. The back stanchions are an eighth of an inch too light, and do not fit above or below.

"10. The floors are fastened with cut nails, and the top rails have neither nails nor pins.

"11. The lock-chains are five inches too short at the short end, having no small links in them, the straight link passing through the middle ring. The breast chains vary in length from two feet four inches to three feet nine inches, and are made of only quarter-inch iron.

"12. The cluck irons are too short, being only two and a quarter inches long on the bolster, and held in place by a quarter-inch bolt, instead of being five inches long and fastened with two three-eighths bolts; some of them are already shaken off. There are no plates on the outside of the hounds to keep the tongue-bolt from wearing, the moon irons are too short, and the hound braces are too short and not made as they should be in any particular.

"13. The back bolsters on the running gear are half an inch too thin and some of them an inch too narrow. The body bolsters are not deep enough by half an inch.

"14. The bows are six inches too high, so that the covers will not come quite down to the top of the side; and the staples for the bows are worthless.

"15. In every body a bar enters the sill at the second stud from each end, cutting the sill more than half off.

"16. Tool boxes are made entirely of white pine and run out square in front, so that the wagon cannot turn without striking the box with the wheel.

"17. The feed troughs are too wide at the top, and are not ironed according to the specifications.

"18. All the timber in the running gear is a soft ash, except the slider bar, which is oak. The bodies are made principally of ash of a poor quality, with a few black oak rails and sills, and a mixture of ash, oak, and birch in the bars.

"The workmanship of these wagons in all the parts is miserably bad; many of the mortises in the sills and rails are a quarter of an inch larger than the tenons, and it may be safely said that there is scarcely a mortise in the whole forty wagons that fits as it should. For use as Government wagons they are entirely worthless."

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day at this hour, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

MR. CLARK. Perhaps we had better finish this bill.

MR. HALE. I move that the special order be postponed with a view to disposing of this bill.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. That motion can only be entertained with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis,] who is entitled to the floor.

MR. DAVIS. If gentlemen would quit speaking and come to a vote I should have no objection.

MR. HALE. I have not spoken on it and do not expect to. We can finish it in a few minutes.

MR. DAVIS. Then I have no objection.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the bill will be proceeded with. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown is still before the Senate.

MR. CLARK. I believe the report which the Senator from Oregon has read was the first report made by Captain Sawtelle. I judge so because that report speaks of the covers of the wagons. Am I right in regard to that matter?

MR. NESMITH. In reply to the Senator I am unable to say whether it is the first or second. It was handed to me as a copy of the report. The first and second reports, I presume, are in the papers. I am not able to say which this is.

MR. CLARK. I judge it to be the first, and indeed I know it is the first, but I desire to be certain on that point. In that first report he speaks of the covers of the wagons as being too small and that they would not come down. In the next report Sawtelle makes, he says the covers of the wagons when he had pulled them down and bolted them into their places were very good and were the best part of the wagons.

The Senate will notice also that in the very report which the Senator has read, he speaks about the hubs being rotten. It was that report which called the attention of Mr. Brown to it, and in the presence of Mr. Sawtelle, who was requested to point out the place which he would select as rotten, this was the result of the investigation. [Exhibiting a piece of wood to the Senate.]

I do not undertake to impute anything against the honesty and integrity of Mr. Sawtelle, except what appears upon the report; and of that I leave the Senate to judge; but I do desire to say here that on an examination of that report and of the things alleged in it, and on an examination of the testimony which was before the committee, the evidence entirely overbore the report. It was that the wagons were well constructed. There was a large amount of testimony on that subject.

I do not desire particularly to go into that subject, but I wish to state here what I know to be a fact, because it is charged here that we make an assault on this officer. I do know—I know it personally—that after this report was made I went to the quartermaster's department. I could not believe but what a claim of this kind would be paid. I called upon the officer in charge to make an examination of this matter because they were wrong in making the refusal of this payment to the claimant, and I was told in the quartermaster's department—I will not say by what officer, because I do not desire to make a personal charge upon anybody—but I was told in the quartermaster's department that they would not overrule the decision of Sawtelle, even if they knew it to be wrong. When I appealed to them that they might go and examine, they said they would not do it if they knew it to be wrong; and now we find the same influence from the quartermaster's department, for I have seen the officer calling out Senators—I know who it is—trying to defeat the claim here. When appealed to in their own department to overrule it if they found it wrong, they said they would not do it if they knew it to be wrong; and still they are following this man and trying to defeat him here in the Senate and postpone him to the Court of Claims.

MR. FOSTER. Mr. President, I made the motion to send the case to the Court of Claims, and I must confess that I have not yet heard any good reason why that motion should not prevail. What is the reason in substance urged against its going to the Court of Claims? This, and this only, that the claim is a just one, that it ought to be paid, and that it is two years or thereabouts old. There are thousands of perfectly just claims against this Government much more than two years old, which if brought to this Senate would be sent to the Court of Claims immediately. Why? Because in the judgment of Congress, the Senate being a constituent part of Congress, we did not think that we could devote our time to the consideration of claims against the Government, but that a tribunal which we have constituted and denominated the Court of Claims is the tribunal for deciding upon such matters.

This it is said is a just claim. Granted: is the principle then to be that this body will entertain all just claims against the Government? If it stands on that ground let us fix that principle. Are we prepared to say that we will entertain jurisdiction of all just claims? If so, we must entertain jurisdiction of every claim brought here, if we are to take the assertion of the party making the claim, for no party will present a claim against the Government without asserting that it is just; and who is prepared to say that it is unjust until he examines it? We must therefore, to be consistent, if we entertain this claim, entertain every claim that is brought, or else we shall discriminate and entertain one claim and not another.

Gentlemen say that this claim is as strong as if it were on a bond against the Government. Granted. Suppose a party comes here on a bond of the Government; he is the holder of a bond, and the Government have refused to pay either the bond or the coupon on the bond, and he petitions the Congress of the United States, and petition is here presented for payment of that bond or of that coupon, will we entertain jurisdiction?

I do not know what the Senate might do on the subject; I would not. On a claim of that sort upon a bond, or a coupon attached to a bond, a petitioner coming here, not doubting the justice of his claim, I would say, as a Senator, "This is not the tribunal to entertain jurisdiction of the matter; go to the Court of Claims." I am prepared to say that, because the law says it, and I am not prepared to repeal the law, or rather I am not prepared to have this body attempt, in effect, to repeal a law which it has not the power of itself to do.

Under these circumstances, if we grant that this claim is just as strong in every particular as its friends contend, it furnishes no reason to my mind why it should not be tried by the proper tribunal. It seems to me clearly improper to attempt to discriminate here between claims that we call just and those that we call unjust, and to say that we will try and dispose of here all the clearly just claims and send all the unjust and all the doubtful ones to the Court of Claims. I may be wrong about this matter; but I would measure out an equal rule to all claims that are brought here of a like character. Those coming within the law should go to the tribunal provided by the law. It seems to me that is the only just, consistent, and proper course for us to pursue. If we take any other course, we shall find ourselves in the difficulty of either having to refuse men who come here, and make discriminations that must be odious and unjust, or we shall have to entertain jurisdiction of all claims that are brought here, and doing that we may as well abolish the Court of Claims at once.

In making these remarks, Mr. President, and in making this motion, I am certainly actuated by no spirit of hostility to this claimant, for I have no knowledge of him except what gentlemen here assert of him, (and nobody asserts the contrary,) that he is a highly respectable man. Taking that for granted, and taking it for granted for the purposes of the argument that he has a just claim properly supported, the Court of Claims is the proper tribunal. It is in session in this building to-day, and will continue in session. The delay occasioned by sending it there will not be great. The delay in this case is no greater than in thousands of other cases. There are a great many claims much older than this that are equally just; and if we at this stage of the session or at any stage take it upon us to entertain jurisdiction of them and try them, Congress must be perpetually in session and engaged in business which the law has provided another tribunal to decide.

MR. CLARK. I shall detain the Senate but a moment, simply to state the history of this claim before Congress. It was presented here early last session, before the law was enacted which authorized the Court of Claims to take cognizance of all questions of contract.

MR. FOSTER. Certainly not before the law existed which took cognizance of this claim, for that is as old as the law organizing the court.

MR. CLARK. The law of 1855 authorized the Court of Claims to hear all cases arising upon contract which were presented to it by petition, but if they came to the Senate or the House of Representatives the Court of Claims was not authorized to hear them unless they were sent there by a direct resolution of the House to which they were presented. But now under the present law they are directed to be presented to the Court of Claims unless either House by resolution directs otherwise.

Last session, before the present law on this subject was passed, this claim was brought into the Senate, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims examined and reported upon it, and the Senate passed the bill unanimously. It went to the House of Representatives, and it was defeated simply for the want of time. At the commencement of this session the claim was again sent to the Committee on Claims of this body. The Committee on Claims did not think that it had jurisdiction of it unless by a resolution of the Senate; and a resolution was passed by the Senate at this session directing the committee to take jurisdiction and cognizance of it; and thereupon they did so, and they examined the case, and they came to the same conclusion which was arrived at last year; and now they report it to the Senate for their action, and there is a motion made to send it before the Court of Claims. This motion is made after the Senate have directed by special resolution the committee to take cognizance of it, and the motion is, in fact, to reverse the action of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have but one suggestion to make on this case. When the resolution referred to was offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, in a modest way I suggested as an objection to it that the petition itself showed that the claim properly belonged to the Court of Claims; but that objection was not supported by any other Senator, and by almost a unanimous vote of the Senate the resolution was adopted, and by the adoption of that resolution, as I read the law on this subject, the Senate assumed jurisdiction of the case and has jurisdiction. The exclusive jurisdiction before might have been in the Court of Claims; but the law makes the adoption of that resolution operate to confer jurisdiction upon the Senate. There is therefore now no question of the jurisdiction, the Senate having assumed it in that formal way. The Committee on Claims has examined this case, found the claim to be right, and reported the bill to the Senate, and I now submit to the Senator from Connecticut it is too late to raise the question of jurisdiction. That point ought to have been made when the Senator from New Hampshire presented his resolution. I attempted, as I have said, in a modest way to raise the objection; but the Senate did not agree to the view that I suggested, but said, "Although this claim grows out of a contract, the Senate will examine it and decide it." The Committee on Claims has examined its merits and decided that it ought to be allowed. Now, I submit it is too late for the Senator to raise the question of jurisdiction, but we ought to act upon the bill. Such cases, I am free to say, ought to go to the Court of Claims; but after we have adopted a resolution such as was adopted in this case, I think under the law we have exclusive jurisdiction of the case. It is not concurrent any longer, and it is not exclusive with the Court of Claims, but is exclusive with the Senate, in my judgment, and I am in favor of the bill.

As one member of the Committee on Claims I voted for the bill upon just this ground: that the contractor agreed to furnish wagons to be approved by an inspector selected by the quartermaster's department of the Government; he manufactured the wagons; and at the place designated in the contract they were examined, and examined before they were painted, and examined by the proper officer; and, as I understand the case, there is not the least evidence that there was collusion between the officer making the inspection and the contractor. The inspection was made; the wagons were received by the proper person selected by the Government for that purpose; and I cannot agree that when these wagons had been thus received by the Government and sent for the Government use several hundred miles away, Captain Sawtelle, or any other person, be he ever so excellent an officer, should, without having any jurisdiction of the question, without having any right to inspect again, undertake to say that these wagons should not be received, and at a great distance from the man's home that they should be thrown upon his hands, not according to the contract, not according to his agreement with the Government, but long after he had complied with every stipulation in his contract, and after the Government's own officer had agreed to receive the wagons. I think it would not be just toward the man to do it. In the absence of fraud, I think we ought to stand by the inspection which was made pursuant to the contract. There is no evidence of fraud or collusion.

Mr. FOSTER. In respect to the allusion made by the honorable Senator from Indiana to the resolution passed by the Senate to which he said he modestly objected, I can only say that it passed the Senate inadvertently so far as I was concerned. I have no recollection of any such resolution, nor do I believe it was a subject to which the attention of Senators was called. We know how such matters ordinarily are, where the chairman of a committee, and especially a chairman in whom we all have so much confidence as we have in the chairman of the Committee on Claims—

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is mistaken; my colleague offered the resolution, not I.

Mr. FOSTER. But if it had the sanction of the committee in any manner, it would pass almost as a matter of course, where it was only to allow a claim to be examined. I can hardly think that the sense of the Senate was expressed upon the resolution in any such way as that we should not now be at liberty to pass upon the question de novo. If there be, however, I would offer instead of my original motion, the following resolution:

Resolved, That in accordance with the 29th rule of the Senate, the bill of the Senate numbered ninety-two, for the relief of Albert Brown, together with the reports and papers belonging to the same, be referred to the Court of Claims.

I wish that the latter clause of the 29th rule may be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"That whenever a private bill is under consideration, it shall be in order to move as a substitute for it a resolution of the Senate referring the case to the Court of Claims."

Mr. FOSTER. If there be any such difficulty as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Indiana, this meets the case, because it applies to a bill reported from a committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that point, as to the question of order whether this resolution now proposed by the Senator from Connecticut is in order, I have to suggest that the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire was adopted, and it has a certain force given to it by law. The law of last year says that by the passage of such a resolution the Senate shall acquire jurisdiction of the claim. Now, I submit that a rule of the Senate passed before the adoption of that law cannot change the effect or force of the resolution which was adopted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can have no doubt that the motion submitted by the Senator from Connecticut is in order, because it is clearly appropriate for the Senate to direct a committee to examine a claim; but whatever may be the sense of the committee after that examination is made, the Senate may then refer it to the Court of Claims. That examination cannot be conclusive upon the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. There can be no doubt, sir, of the jurisdiction of the Senate in this matter, if they choose to exercise it; nor of the fact that the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut is in order; but I have only a single remark to make, for I am very anxious to come to a vote on the question and get to other business. While the Court of Claims is established properly to take cognizance of cases of this character, yet where a claim is clearly one of great justice, and where hardship accompanies it, it is very hard indeed to send the parties to it before the Court of Claims, there to employ counsel and fritter it away in prosecuting it against the Government.

I do not undertake to enter this discussion by saying that this claim has character, although it is claimed for it by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims, in whom the Senate undoubtedly has great confidence. I am prepared, under his direction, by his advice, to vote upon this question, and I hope we shall come to a vote, first upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut, and then, if that be not adopted, upon the bill itself, and get rid of it.

Mr. HOWE. I did not intend to take any further part in this debate, and would not but for a remark that was dropped by the Senator from Oregon to the effect that the committee had done more to prosecute an attack upon the department of the Quartermaster General than to maintain the claim of Mr. Brown. I think I may say that the committee had no design whatever to attack the Quartermaster General or to attack Captain Sawtelle. It is known to me that the author of the report which accompanies this bill had never seen either Captain Sawtelle or Mr. Brown, had not the slightest prejudice against them, nor the slightest prepossession in favor of either of them; and if the Senator from Oregon or any one else will take the pains to look at the report he will see but little in it except a summing up of the evidence which was before the committee.

There had been two certificates of inspection presented to the committee; one was by Mr. Patten, who was appointed by the Government especially to inspect the wagons, the other was by Captain Sawtelle, who had no authority whatever to inspect them. The committee had both of these certificates before them. There was evidence in the case maintaining the good character of Mr. Patten; there was no evidence whatever upon the character of Mr. Sawtelle, and that fact was noticed in the report. It was said by the committee that there was evidence establishing the good character of Mr. Patten, but there was no such evidence in reference to the character of Mr. Sawtelle. That is all. The committee did not say that there was any evidence there impeaching the character of Mr. Sawtelle, and they did not say it themselves.

There was this fact: that a mechanic had furnished one hundred Army wagons to the Government, and the Quartermaster General had so contrived that the Government had received no benefit from those wagons. They were not used. The mechanic who made them had lost them. The Government had seen fit to take no benefit whatever from them; and the committee thought upon the question of law that the Government was absolutely compelled to pay for the wagons whether they were good for anything or not. They were compelled to pay for the wagons as a matter of law, because the contract was complete, as much so, as I said the other day, as if the individual held the Government's bond for the amount. The committee thought, at least I did, that it was a singular administration of the department from which that result followed.

The Senator from Oregon has read one of the certificates of inspection furnished by Captain Sawtelle. He has not read the other. Both of those certificates were before the committee, and they examined them. The report shows that they were both there. Both of these inspections show that the wagons differed from the wagons provided for in the contract; but the difference between either of these inspections and the specifications in the contract is not greater than is the difference between the two inspections themselves. This same inspector, Captain Sawtelle, furnishes two certificates of inspection, and the two differ as much from each other as either does from the specifications of the contract.

And now I want to call the attention of the Senate to the explanation which Captain Sawtelle gives of having these two inspections. Here is his letter, written on the 7th of September, 1861, to the Quartermaster General:

"Mr. A. Brown has just showed me a copy of his contract with Major Miller, of the quartermaster's department, for Army wagons. The specifications shown me by Mr. Brown differed from those furnished me from your office in the following particulars, namely: that the hubs are to be of elm instead of gum; and that the spokes and the felloes shall be yellow oak instead of white oak."

There is the difference between the specifications in the contract which Brown made, and the specifications which Sawtelle says he had before him when he made the first inspection. And now neither of his inspections shows what wood the hubs were made of, or what wood the spokes were made of, but this is the reason why he makes the second inspection. He goes on:

"Mr. Brown also shows me a copy of a letter from your office, directing him to send all the wagons contracted for with him (one hundred) to me. I have only been informed from your office that forty wagons are to be delivered here by Mr. Brown. The inspection of Mr. Brown's wagons (first forty received) was made prior to the receipt by me of a copy of the specifications from your office, and in the inspection and report I was governed by the old specification for Army wagons."

"I shall have made and furnished you as soon as practicable a new inspection-report on Mr. Brown's wagons, agreeing with the copy furnished me from your office. I am satisfied that the sixty wagons now here, not yet unloaded, as well as the forty received last month, are entirely unfit for Government service."

Forty wagons had been received and inspected, and he had furnished the certificate. Sixty wagons had come there, but were not unloaded, and Captain Sawtelle, without any inspection, without seeing them thrown off the cars, notifies the Quartermaster General in advance that he is satisfied that they are entirely unfit for the Government service. They might have been so, but he was satisfied of it without any evidence!

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut insists that this question ought to go to the Court of Claims. He says the law so provides. He has been repeatedly reminded that the law only provides that such claims shall go there unless the Senate or the House of Representatives, to whichever body the claim is presented, otherwise direct. He has been repeatedly reminded that the Senate has twice otherwise directed. The first time it sent it, not to the Court of Claims, but to the Committee on Claims, and when they reported the bill and recommended its passage the Senate by a unanimous vote adopted it, but it did not pass the other House for want of time. Then it was brought up again, and notwithstanding the Senator from Indiana reminded the Senate that it was a proper case for the Court of Claims, the Senate directed it to go to the Committee on Claims; and now the Senator from Connecticut urges, in spite of this action, that it shall go to the Court of Claims, which will have the effect necessarily to delay it one year. Mr. Brown is out of the wagons and needs the money. He is a mechanic. The Senator says that there are hundreds and thousands of claims just as honest as this.

Mr. GRIMES. Was Sawtelle before your committee?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; but the Quartermaster General was called upon by the committee to furnish any evidence or reasons which the Government had in its possession why the wagons were not paid for, and he furnished these two contradictory reports of Mr. Sawtelle, and that was all the evidence he laid before us.

The Senator from Connecticut says there are hundreds of thousands of dollars just as honestly due as this that the Government owes. I am not surprised to hear it. When a claim like this is made the subject of debate, of settled and fixed opposition here day after day, I am not surprised to hear that the Government has a great many honest creditors whose claims have been delayed year after year. But I want to say this, and I think it is the last thing I shall say, that until the Government can deny such a reproach as that, it will not have the credit that a fair and honest Government ought to have. While Senators can stand up here, so long as they are enabled to stand up here, and say as the Senator from Connecticut does, that there are hundreds of thousands of dollars due from the Government to honest creditors who are deterred from coming here with their claims, the Government will not have the credit it ought to have.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Chair desires to say that the Senator from Connecticut first informally moved to refer the bill to the Court of Claims, and on that the yeas and nays are ordered. The Chair regards this as the same motion reduced to writing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall detain the Senate but a moment, and that without going into any discussion of the merits of this claim, but I wish to submit to the Senator from California who made the point that this was a clear case, and saw no reason why it should be referred to the Court of Claims, that if he acts upon that principle it involves the examination of every claim brought against the Government, because we cannot determine whether it is a just claim or not till we investigate it, and if we go into the investigation and find it is a just claim, then we are to pay it.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will permit me. I did not say that this was such a case. I predicted what I did say upon that subject on the recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Claims. I simply said this: that where cases were shown upon investigation to be clear and unquestionable, it was hard then to compel the parties to them to prosecute them against the Government in the Court of Claims, and that only the class of claims should be sent there which carried some doubt with them or which were uncertain.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I understood the Senator; and does he not see that that involves an investigation of every claim here? How is he to know whether there is some doubt about a claim until he examines it?

Mr. CONNESS. I spoke of those already examined.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This has been examined, and the committee having reported in its favor the Senator assumes that this is a proper claim to be paid. Every claim that a committee reported in favor of would be entitled to the same presumption as this, if he places it on the ground of a report of a committee.

This may be a proper claim to be allowed. I will not undertake to say it is not; about that there is a contrariety of opinion; but it does seem to me that if we have a Court of Claims for the investigation of claims we should send all claims of which it has jurisdiction before it. Is there any doubt that the Court of Claims would have jurisdiction of this case? I do not understand that there is. If there is not, why should it not go there? I think that the Court of Claims is a great deal safer upon general principles to investigate claims against the Government than a committee of Congress; and I mean no disparagement to our committees by this remark, and I do not mean that it shall apply to this particular case.

The reason that I think the court safer than a committee is this: the court is provided with attorneys whose duty it is to attend to the interests of the Government; the court takes testimony on both sides, and the witnesses are cross-examined, and the case is presented there as it is presented in other judicial tribunals. Before a committee of Congress affidavits are received; the statement of the petitioner is received, and our experience is that many unjust claims have passed through Congress on the reports of committees in their favor, because the committees had but a superficial view of the case; they saw but one side of it. If you allow a party to make his own case, bring in ex parte testimony, and take no pains to obtain counter testimony, or to ascertain the facts from other sources than such as he presents, he will almost always make a good case.

Now, do not understand me as applying that to this case. I am speaking upon general principles, and I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut upon the ground that we have established a Court of Claims, which I believe is saving to this Government millions of dollars every winter. Millions of dollars are saved by the investigations that the court makes which would be obtained from the Government on ex parte testimony without the investigation which the claims are subjected to in that tribunal. Having such a court, I think we should refer all the claims of which it has jurisdiction to it for adjudication; and hence I shall vote upon that general principle to refer this claim there, and it is no argument to me to say that this claim is a just claim. Every claimant says he has a just claim; and if we are to investigate it here to ascertain whether it be a just claim or not, then we are doing that very thing which the Court of Claims was organized to relieve us of.

I trust that the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut will prevail, because if we entertain jurisdiction in this case we set a precedent which is to compel us hereafter to examine claims, and whenever a claim shall be presented here from any source and a Senator shall say that it is a just claim and a clear case, we must look into it to see if it be so, and if it be so we must pass upon it without referring it to the Court of Claims, because that reference would occasion delay and put the party to the necessity of employing counsel.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that there is a good deal more in this case than the mere question of paying Mr. Brown for the wagons which, it is said, he has made for the Government. We virtually rebuke one of the officers of this Government by the passage of the bill, taken in connection with the declarations that have been made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] in regard to Colonel Sawtelle, or Major Sawtelle, or whatever his rank may be. We say to the world in effect that that man has been attempting to perpetrate a great injustice on a Government contractor; that in his capacity as an inspector of Army wagons he has done a great wrong; and it is upon that ground that the appeal is made to us to pass this bill, instead of sending it to the Court of Claims, there to have the question determined whether Colonel Sawtelle acted properly or improperly.

What is going to be the effect of such action as that by the Senate and by the House of Representatives in regard to the operations of our armies? Does not every sensible man in the country know that a great many of the disasters to our arms have been caused by defects in wagons? Put one of the kind of wagons which Colonel Sawtelle described, and supposed these to be, at the head of a vast wagon train, such wagon trains as are now moving across Mississippi, extending sixteen miles in length, and over a poor road and in a narrow way; the defects in one wagon at the head of the train may cause the loss of the whole train and bring disaster to our arms. I am not in favor of passing this bill without giving Colonel Sawtelle and the officers of the Army who are charged with the very responsible duty of inspecting wagons an opportunity to be heard before the Court of Claims.

As the Senator from Oregon has well said, the inducements are all in favor of the claimant, and if the officer was influenced by anything extraneous and improper the result would not have been in favor of the Government. I cannot conceive it possible that Colonel Sawtelle attempted to perpetrate a great act of injustice on Mr. Brown. And as to the extraordinary discrepancies between the two reports made by Colonel Sawtelle alluded to by the Senator from Wisconsin, they do not strike me as anything very extraordinary.

It does not strike me as anything very extraordinary that Colonel Sawtelle having inspected forty Army wagons, and seeing sixty more on the same pattern, that had arrived on a train and were yet unloaded, should express the general opinion to his commanding officer, the Quartermaster General, that he was satisfied none of them were fit for Army purposes.

I wish the Senate to bear in mind that while we may be doing justice to Mr. Brown by passing the bill we may also be doing a great injustice to Colonel Sawtelle and to the Army and to the country by passing it in the way and manner in which it is attempted to be passed. The whole question ought to be referred to the Court of Claims, and there let the Government be heard as well as Mr. Brown and his attorneys.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot permit what the Senator from Iowa has said to pass unnoticed, because it might be inferred from his remarks that the committee were willing to do injustice to Colonel Sawtelle or Major Sawtelle.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say so.

Mr. CLARK. I did not say that the Senator said so; I said that it might be inferred from his remarks. Now I desire to state that before this case was examined at all by the committee they sent to the quartermaster's department to know what the department had to say why the claim should not be paid. The department sent to the committee these two reports of Colonel or Major Sawtelle, and nothing else. Since the case has been under consideration at the present session, Colonel or Major Sawtelle has been in this city; he has been here within a week; and instead of coming before the committee and saying that he had any reason in the world why the claim should not be paid, he has kept entirely away.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether or not the committee have had Colonel Sawtelle before them, or have attempted to secure his attendance? I know he is in the city; he has been about the city for a long time.

Mr. CLARK. We have not attempted to secure his attendance, for when we saw him button-holing Senators and calling them out one after another and talking at the door, we supposed he had notice of what was going on.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Senator pardon me for a word?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. In connection with the remark the Senator has just made, I wish to say that after the first discussion in the Senate upon this report, I went to the Quartermaster General, General Meigs, and asked if Colonel Sawtelle was in town. He told me that he was. Colonel Sawtelle was a stranger to me, and I asked as a favor that the Quartermaster General would order him to come up here and call me out, as I wanted to see him. The Quartermaster General said he would send a message to Colonel Sawtelle, directing him to come up here. He has come, and, as he said, in compliance with a direction from his chief, General Meigs, and I have conversed with him. That, I suppose, is a part of the button-holing to which the honorable Senator alludes. The officer came here because I requested his chief to send him here to see me.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a point of order. I yielded for a vote, and not for a long debate.

The VICEPRESIDENT. It is not in the power of the Chair to stop debate. The Senator yielded the floor unconditionally.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say that I have never seen Colonel Sawtelle. I do not know him from Adam. He has never button-holed me.

Mr. NESMITH. The Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to say that Colonel Saw-telle never called me out, but I called for him at his office to make inquiry about this matter.

Mr. CLARK. I do not see any occasion for all this. I did not say that the Senator from Connecticut had been applied to—

Mr. FOSTER. No, but the charge was that Colonel Sawtelle had been to us. It happens to be the other way; we went after him.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask, are these all the Senators in the Senate? I did not say that the Senator from Iowa was applied to or the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Connecticut. They are but three out of about fifty. But one thing is shown by these statements, that Colonel Sawtelle was sent for and had notice of the whole thing, and did not choose to come before the committee and say a word to the committee.

Mr. GRIMES. This has been since the bill was reported by the committee to the Senate after it passed out of the committee's hands.

Mr. CLARK. But why not come to the committee and say, "You have made a mistake; let me show it to you." The Government were notified and had nothing to say.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. FOSTER, resulted—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Foot, Hale, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 13th instant the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen; and

A bill (H. R. No. 225) making an appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the third, fifteenth, and sixteenth amendments of the Senate to the said bill; and had appointed Mr. ELIHU B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD of New York, managers at the same on its part.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (No. 35) of thanks of Congress to the volunteer soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is now before the body, being the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a philosopher and a poet once published a couplet:

"For forms of government let fools contest;
That which is best administered is best."

There is more truth and philosophy than poetry in that couplet. In point of excellence and perfection of form there is no Government on earth that ever had existence which is equal to ours; but in its administration at this time I believe that it is one of the most oppressive and grinding that now exist. I think it is practically a military despotism. There is no constitutional provision, there is no law of Congress, there is no constitution or law of a State but what crumbles in its presence and at its touch.

The Constitution of the United States establishes the judicial department of the Government. It refers all questions of a judicial character, whether arising under the Constitution or the law, to that department for its decision. There is no right of the citizen, whether it be personal, appertaining to his life and his liberty or his property, but what is legitimately the subject of the inquiry and judgment of the judicial department of the Government. But in this day of usurpation of power and of practical revolution these provisions of the Constitution and the law are wholly disregarded; and the President of the United States, under a claim of military necessity, repudiates and sweeps away the whole Constitution and all the laws of Congress, and all the civil tribunals appointed by the Constitution and law for their enforcement, and in their stead he substitutes, by his own arbitrary will, military courts, and makes the indefinite and indefinable law of their own will the rule of their proceedings, actions, and judgments, instead of the ordinary and civil law by which to adjudge and punish the citizen.

There is no man whose rights are safe from the assaults of the Government of the United States at this time. There is no man whose property is not subject to be taken from him by the arbitrary action of some subordinate military officer, without compensation, without any proper inquiry for the purpose of deciding whether there is a state of case in which such power may be rightfully exercised. There is no provision made by law to remunerate the owner of property for that which was thus arbitrarily taken from him. The writ of habeas corpus is suspended; and on that point I will remark that the only proper effect of it is to prevent the citizen from having that summary and ex parte examination of his case that is incident to the return and to the hearing of the writ. The suspension of the writ does not properly arrest or suspend or obstruct the legal trial by the proper civil court, which every citizen is entitled to have according to the guarantee of the Constitution; and any courts which lend themselves to the purpose of suspending the due administration of the law by refusing such trials, make themselves criminally subservient to the same usurpation of power.

There is no citizen of the United States, even in the loyal States, but what is subject, at all times, to be arrested at any hour of the day or the night, without any process issued out according to the requisitions of the Constitution, without any charge of offense or crime, without its being communicated to him what is the cause of his arrest; and he is subject to be dragged from his home to distant prisons, and there to be indefinitely confined in a dungeon without any protection or redress.

Sir, under our form of constitutional government, and of its limited and restricted jurisdiction, in addition to the abuses which I have enumerated, all the State laws of every State, loyal as well as disloyal, are subject to be superseded by the arbitrary will of the President and his military subordinates; courts are deposed; judges are driven from their halls; ministerial officers with process in their hands are interdicted from making execution of them; and armed men invade the courts for the purpose of suppressing the due execution of law and defeating the protection which it should vouchsafe to every citizen.

Sir, not only all this abuse; but when the wave of rebellion is driven back from some of the States, and our conquering armies have taken or are about to take undisputed possession of those reconquered States, the President of the United States assumes the unconstitutional and dictatorial power to prohibit those States from returning to the Union under their constitutions and laws. He imposes upon them conditions which he has no more authority or power to impose than you or I have, and he requires that these conditions shall be complied with by their people before they shall be admitted to their constitutional rights as

States of this Confederacy, and the people of those States to the protection, the rights, and the liberties guaranteed to them by the Federal Constitution and laws and their own States' constitutions and laws.

Sir, under the impression produced upon my mind by this hasty and imperfect review, I come to the conclusion, and I here declare in my place my solemn conviction, that the despotism of Russia or of Austria is not so oppressive, so galling, and so grinding as the military despotism that is now in full operation in the United States. This military despotism has been but partially executed. Reflect the incumbent who now fills the presidential chair, or elect a man of the same or more extreme principles and policy, and you then confirm by the vote and by the majesty of the people of the United States the present usurpations of those in power, their assumptions of that enormous and tyrannical amount of power that never was intended to be, and never was in fact, delegated to them by the framers of the Constitution, and which if it had been proposed would have produced a prompt rejection by that body unanimously, I have no doubt, if it had not broken up the body itself without accomplishing its work.

Sir, what said, as reported in the papers, our Secretary of State to the British minister, Lord Lyons? "My lord, I can touch a bell on my right hand and order the arrest of a citizen of Ohio; I can touch the bell again and order the imprisonment of a citizen of New York; and no power on earth except that of the President can release him. Can the Queen of England do as much?" No, sir; nor the Emperor Napoleon, nor the Emperor Alexander, nor any other potentate of the earth, can enact the same despotism that is expressed in this brief but most true and most terrible picture of arbitrary power.

Mr. ANTHONY. Allow me to ask the Senator from Kentucky when such remarks were made by the Secretary of State?

Mr. DAVIS. I have just stated that all I know about it is its publication in the newspapers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator deem that sufficient authority on which to present such a statement to the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS. I should be gratified to find that it was not true; but if it was not true I should suppose the Secretary of State would contradict it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I leave the Senator himself to decide whether it is not more proper to find out that a statement is true before he quotes it in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Here is the report of a most extraordinary declaration by the Secretary of State to the minister of the first Power on earth accredited to our Government. This declaration is published in the papers, and, so far as I know and have understood, it never has been contradicted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will ask if the Senator from Kentucky—

Mr. DAVIS. Let me proceed, if you please. Make a memorandum of your questions, and present them to me when I get through. I would rather answer them altogether.

Mr. ANTHONY. The only question I wish to ask is whether the Senator himself is in the habit of contradicting the remarks he finds in the newspapers about himself, or are we to believe everything that we see about him in the papers which he does not contradict?

Mr. DAVIS. If I were Secretary of State, and such a remark as that were made about my communications to Lord Lyons, the British minister, and it was not true, I certainly would contradict it.

But, Mr. President, I proceed now in the line of my remarks. It is not my purpose to occupy any more time than is necessary, and I do not wish to trouble the Senate again at any length. I know the Senate are weary with hearing me, and, to acknowledge the God's truth, I am beginning to be really wearied of hearing myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday I had advanced to that stage in the history and the progress of action by the great State of Massachusetts when she had reversed all her former principles and positions. And now let me read of some public action and resolves of that State in support of this new and most extraordinary, unconstitutional, illegal, and unjust policy upon which she has entered with so much vim.

A convention was held in Boston in 1855 that unanimously adopted resolutions which I will read:

"Resolved, That a Constitution which provides for a slave representation and a slave oligarchy in Congress, which legalizes slave-hunting and slave-catching on every inch of America's soil, and which pledges the military and naval power of the country to keep four million chattel slaves in their chains, is to be trodden under foot and pronounced accursed, however unexceptionable and valuable its other provisions may be."

When Massachusetts was fulminating such a denunciation as that against the Constitution, why did she not recollect and why was she not brought to shame and to dumbness by her previous course in relation to the same subject? Why was she not struck mute by her course in the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States? Why did she denounce a provision of the Constitution that was passed by the unanimous support of the members of the Convention, including her own, that provision which secures to the owners of fugitive slaves their rendition from other States into which they may have escaped?

The next resolution of this series is:

"Resolved, That the one great issue before the country is the dissolution of the Union, in comparison with which all other issues with the slave power are as dust in the balance; therefore we will give ourselves to the work of annulling this 'covenant with death' as essential to our own innocence and the speedy and everlasting overthrow of the slave system."

Sir, gentlemen get up now and flippantly and audaciously hurl the charge of treason at other members of the Senate, and at true and loyal citizens over the land—men who have uttered this treasonable sentiment, men who have cherished it as the purpose and object of their lives and of their policy. In January, 1857, Massachusetts held a State convention at Worcester, that passed the resolutions that I will now read:

"Resolved, That this movement does not seek merely disunion, but the more perfect union of the free States by the expulsion of the slave States from the confederation in which they have ever been an element of discord, danger, and disgrace."

There is a slight mistake. The true subject of that denunciation should have been, not the slave States, but the State of Massachusetts herself. "Give the devil his due." Speak of South Carolina and the other States that are now in this wicked rebellion, and when, and where, and how did they ever interfere with the constitutions and laws of the northern or free States, with their domestic institutions, with their rights of property, with any of those interests or affairs that were left to them by the Constitution and over which they had the exclusive jurisdiction? The southern States never intermeddled in the domestic concerns of Massachusetts or any of the other northern States; and if Massachusetts had herself acted with the same forbearance, with the same scrupulous regard to the provisions and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States and to the great principles upon which our system, State and Federal, is based, we should not now have this deplorable war upon us.

The next resolution was:

"Resolved, That it is not probable that the ultimate severance of the Union will be an act of deliberation or discussion, but that a long period of deliberation and discussion must precede it; and this we meet to begin."

They mean to begin for the diabolical purpose of agitating with a view to the dissolution of the Union! Was there ever so treasonable an avowal so boldly made by any body of men?

"Resolved, That henceforward, instead of regarding it as an objection to any system of policy, that it will lead to the separation of the States, we will proclaim that to be the highest of all recommendations and the greatest proof of statesmanship; and we will support, politically or otherwise, such men and measures as appear to tend most to this result."

"Resolved, That by the repeated confession of northern and southern statesmen, 'the existence of the Union is the chief guarantee of slavery'; and that the despots of the whole world have everything to fear, and the slaves of the whole world everything to hope, from its destruction and the rise of a free northern republic."

"Resolved, That the sooner the separation takes place the more peaceful it will be; but that peace or war is a secondary consideration in view of our present perils. Slavery must be conquered, 'peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.'"

That principle they then took up and they are now acting fully up to its execution, not by the power of Massachusetts alone, but by the aggregate power of the vast armies of the United States.

"Resolved, That the experience of more than sixty years has proved our national Government to be a mere creature and tool of the slave power."

How? Had not the free States preponderated in the two Houses of Congress and in the electoral college which made the President and Vice President ever since the beginning of the Government? Had they not always the power and the strength to make whom they willed President and Vice President, and to pass such laws as they chose? Then the course of presidential elections and of congressional legislation was the judgment and the act of the free States, at least so many of them and such of their representatives and electors as when united with those from the slave States gave them power. But my recollection both of legislation and of presidential elections is that never until sectional parties grew up in the United States were there any divisions of that kind in relation to any subject of policy and legislation, or in the election of President and Vice President; but it was always a mixed vote of free and slave States, without a division and separation by the line of slavery.

"Resolved, That the experience of more than sixty years has proved our national Government to be a mere creature and tool of the slave power, subservient only to the purpose of despotism; a formidable obstacle to the advancement and prosperity both of the free and slave States; a libel upon our democratic theories of government; a disgrace to the civilization of the age, and a bitter curse to the cause of freedom in our own country and throughout the world."

Did not every point and subject of this bitter malediction exist at the time that the Convention framed our present Constitution? Did they not all exist at the era of the Declaration of Independence, and when it was recognized by the treaty of 1783? Were not all these matters that are thus bitterly denounced, originated, built up, and sustained by the action of Massachusetts? These resolutions proceed:

"Resolved, That, in view of this long and painful experience, we have no longer any hope of its reformation, but are fully convinced that the best interests of every section of the country require its immediate dissolution."

"Resolved, That this convention recommends, as the first step toward the accomplishment of this object, the organization in each of the States of a political party outside of the present Constitution and Union—a party whose candidates shall be publicly pledged, in the event of their election, to ignore the Federal Government, to refuse an oath to its Constitution, and to make their respective States free and independent commonwealths."

Sir, was there ever a fouler or more audacious position of disloyalty to our Government, a bolder and more daring disregard of the obligations which every citizen owed to the Government, than is manifested in this series of resolutions? Now, I will read some of the mottoes inscribed upon the banners of this dissolution party in the State of Massachusetts and other States who are members of the loyal leagues and making such lofty claims of unconditional support of the Union:

"Thorough organization and independent political action on the part of the non-slaveholding whites of the South. Ineligibility of slaveholders. Never another vote to the traffickers in human flesh."

"No patronage to slaveholding merchants; no guests to slaveholding hotels; no fees to slaveholding lawyers; no employment to slaveholding physicians; no audience to slaveholding parsons; no recognition of pro-slavery men except as ruffians, outlaws, and criminals."

"Immediate death to slavery, or, if not immediate, unqualified proscription of its advocates during the period of its existence."

Was there ever a fiercer, a more savage and unrelenting war denounced against any institution or any set of men who were faithfully sustaining their Government and laws, their only sin being the adoption of slavery, an institution founded by Massachusetts?

The descendants of those men now turn upon an institution which they fostered and carried to and enlarged in the southern States by the slave traffic, in their own ships and with their own capital. Is it not one of the most extraordinary and extreme inconsistencies ever exhibited to mankind? Could any race of people except the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers be guilty of it?

Mr. President, Massachusetts in 1843 passed her first law in direct hostility to the fugitive slave law of 1793. That law was enacted in obedience to an express provision of the Constitution, that persons held to slavery in one State escaping into another should be rendered back to their owners. That provision of the Constitution was as valid and as obligatory on the people of Massachusetts and their Senators as any provision in that instrument. The law was passed when Washington was President, and by a Congress many of whose members had been engaged in the revolutionary struggle and had been members of the Federal Convention. It was passed in the Senate without a division, and in the House of Representatives by a vote of 58 to 7. It came under the revision of the courts of the United States and of the States, and it was sustained by every judicial tribunal, Federal and State. It was approved by the Father of his country, the man at the head of the human race, who rises high above every other specimen of humanity, notwithstanding he was a slaveholder, and who in all his attributes and his whole life was more godlike than any individual man that has appeared upon earth since the days of the inspired apostles.

Shortly after Congress had passed the second fugitive slave law, in 1850, there was formed in Boston an association that combined talent, wealth, office, position, numbers, and permanency, for the special and declared purpose, and by all means, even unto organized armed resistance, to defeat any and all attempts to execute the fugitive slave laws in that State; and now her paramount and darling purpose in the vehement support she gives to the war is, not for restoration, but revolutionary and violent overthrow of slavery and the organism of the slave States, and virtually of the Union and Constitution of the United States, by making their armies the instrument of this her work of destruction.

Will the Senator from Massachusetts at the head of the Military Committee state on this floor that he never had knowledge of that association in the city of Boston and of the special and isolated object of its organization? Did he never meet with it in council? Was he never advised with by its leading and active members? Did he never give it his countenance and support? The other Senator from Massachusetts is too open I presume to deny his position in relation to that organization, but his more covert colleague is dumb and silent in relation to these points of interrogatory. But I will proceed with what I was saying in regard to Massachusetts. Her most sinister, selfish, and wicked ends are in that way to get possession of the rich cotton and sugar lands and the freed negroes of the southern States, and work them in perpetuity for the emolument of the sons of the Pilgrim Fathers; to reduce the southern States to a sort of colonial dependence, and to make them industrially, commercially, and politically subservient to herself and the northern States.

That is the whole scheme, combining fanaticism, avarice, meddlesomeness, and all the other obnoxious characteristics that appertain to that peculiar people, the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers.

I have before me a Life of the fugitive slave Burns written by Stevens, a Massachusetts man. After speaking of the public excitement produced in Boston by that arrest, he adds:

"No immediate step was taken, however, except by an association styled a committee of vigilance. This association took its origin from the passage of the fugitive slave act. Its sole object was to defeat in all cases the execution of that hated statute. Thoroughly organized under a written code of laws, with the necessary officers and working committees, arranged on the principle of a subdivision of labor, with wealth and professional talent at its command, actuated by the most determined purpose and operating in secret, it was well fitted to strike powerful blows for the accomplishment of its object."

That object was the defeat and the overthrow of an act of Congress by a bold and treasonable band of conspirators, which, if successful, would have been pro tanto a dissolution of the Union; and yet men who support and give their presence and countenance and aid to such organization for such a purpose, have the face to come here and take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which this whole movement was intended to strike down in part, and to brand as disloyal and semi-traitorous men more true and loyal to the Government and to every principle of good faith than they. The historian further says of this association:

"The roll of its members displayed the most diversified assemblage of characters, but this diversity only secured the greater efficiency. The white and the colored race, free-born sons of Massachusetts and fugitive slaves from the South, here co-operated together. Among them were men of fine culture and of high social position. Some of the rich men of Boston were enrolled in this committee."

The historian then proceeds to give details of the many modes in which this organization operated. He adds:

"By this committee of vigilance the case of Burns was now taken in hand. Early in the afternoon of the day following his arrest a full meeting for the purpose was secretly convened."

For what purpose? To take Burns from the custody of the law, and in that way to repeal, practically to put down, the law of Congress. I read further:

"On the main point there was but one voice; all agreed that, be the commissioner's decision what it might, Burns should never be taken back to Virginia if it were in their power to prevent."

Burns was arrested on the 24th of May, 1854, and by the judgment of the commissioner was rendered up to his master the 2d of June. In that interval there was addressed a circular letter to the "yeomanry of Massachusetts" adjuring them to rendezvous at Boston with a view to the case of Burns. Some three hundred men were organized in Worcester and marched to Boston, and large numbers from most of the adjacent towns concentrated there. Every sort of appeal was made by the leading friends of Burns to inflame and madden the people in his favor and to rescue him at any cost. One night it was estimated there were from eight to ten thousand infuriated men, and the most of them secretly armed, surrounding the court-house in which he was confined to coerce his release. To execute the fugitive slave law in his case about two thousand armed and drilled men, artillery, infantry, marines, and volunteers, had to be assembled to sustain the civil magistrates.

But for that effective and large military force to sustain the civil officers, what would have become of the law of Congress and of those appointed magistrates for its execution? The whirlwind of passion and crime that then agitated Boston and rocked that city from its center to its exterior would have swept these powerless officers from their places, and Burns would have been rescued and set free, and there would have been a practical revolution of the Government consummated, not total, but to the extent of the overthrow of an important policy and law of Congress, in which nearly half the States were deeply interested. If bold and daring treason had been successful, the Government would virtually have been brought to an end; its whole moral power would have been subverted; and it would have been condemned, not only in relation to that law, but to all others that the treasonable and wicked spirit of Massachusetts might have prompted her to resist.

On the second night after Burns's arrest, and before the forces to rescue him, or those to prevent it, had assembled in large numbers, a portion of his armed friends, led on by Rev. Thomas W. Higginson, made an assault on the court-house in which he was confined and guarded by United States soldiery, to wrest him from the custody of the law. The door was ponderous and strong, but, by a kind of catapult, the assailants broke out one of its panels, and Higginson and a few of his associate traitors made an entry. They were repelled, but Batchelder, one of the assistant marshals, was mortally wounded, it was said by Higginson; and a soldier was also wounded. Higginson was both a murderer and traitor, and, if possible, should have been twice hung in expiation of each offense. But the present Executive has appointed him colonel of a negro regiment.

Sir, what kind of a moral example is that? The President of the United States is sworn to uphold, defend, and protect the Constitution and to execute the laws, and yet he appoints a murderer and a traitor to be a colonel of one of the regiments now in the military service of the United States.

The Senator from Massachusetts—I mean the military Senator—did not answer, but evaded the question whether "he was against the rescue of Burns," and replied, "I had nothing to do with it," and repeated, "I had nothing to do with it, and had no knowledge of it until after it transpired. I was not in my own State at the time." And to the question, "Did you ever condemn that insurrection? Did you ever do anything to put it down—its spirit?" he would not answer directly, but evasively, thus: "There was no occasion; it was put down quickly."

At the time of the attempted rescue of Burns, did not that Senator know that there existed a powerful organization in Boston formed for no other purpose than to defeat the execution of the fugitive slave law as often as there should be an arrest under it? Was he ever counseled in relation to that association, and its object and modus operandi? Had he learned that this rescue would be attempted, and did he run away from his friends and comrades as he did from the battle of Bull Run, to avoid responsibility and danger? Natick, his place of residence, is, I believe, about seventeen miles from Boston. How came he to be away from his home and out of the State for more than nine days from the time Burns was arrested until he was rendered up and taken "back to old Virginny"? Where was he all that time? What was he doing? Is it not most strange that in more than nine days he should not have heard of this most exciting affair, the telegraph, too, being in operation? But the member from Massachusetts said of this demonstration to rescue Burns:

"The Senator [Mr. Davis] prates about a little mob composed of a few men in the city of Boston, and brands their action as insurrection and rebellion. Insurrection! Rebellion! Sir, there was no insurrection; there was no rebellion. It was at most but a mob, and a very small mob at that."

The Senator has become so greatly augmented that he has not only Cyclopean notions of himself but also of rebellions and insurrections. I have presented to the Senate the facts of the attempt to rescue Burns, as published in the newspapers at the time, and as they have since been recorded by a Boston historian. It was one outbreak of a numerous and powerful organization of conspirators and traitors, who had combined and confederated together to defy the authority of the United States, and by force of arms and all other means to defeat wholly and in all cases as they might arise the execution of their law. That organization had then existed for years, and I suppose still exists. It was much more formidable in its plan, arrangement, numbers, wealth, intelligence, duration, and in the force it displayed when the rescue was attempted than was the combination in Pennsylvania to defeat the execution of the law of Congress to levy an excise on whisky. That was at the time and now is in history denominated an insurrection, and so will and so ought the attempt to rescue Burns to be characterized, and if it had been successful would have been pro tanto a revolution of the Government by force of arms.

But, Mr. President, in the face of the facts which I have arrayed to the contrary, the member from Massachusetts has the effrontery to declare to the country in this Chamber that—"No man in her Legislature desired or expected to resist the authority of the Federal Government. What Massachusetts intended to accomplish by her legislation was the protection of her own citizens; and if any question arose between her and the Federal Government, growing out of the attempted execution of the fugitive slave act, she was ever ready to submit those questions to the judicial tribunals of the country and to abide the verdict."

This position is both disingenuous and untrue. It attempts to make a discrimination between the men in her Legislature and her people, and to claim a special immunity for the former alone. All questions arising under the fugitive slave law, however the Legislature of Massachusetts might endeavor to draw those coming up in that State to her own courts, are by an express provision of the Constitution referred exclusively to the decision of the Federal courts. They had all been decided, again and again, by the Supreme Court and the circuit courts of the United States against her positions and assumptions. She would not abide by those decisions; and it was in a treasonable spirit and effort to reverse them, and practically to nullify the fugitive slave laws of Congress, that she passed what is called "her personal liberty bill," by which, against the Constitution of the United States, she sought to bring and retry all those questions in her own abolition courts and by her own abolition juries.

Was Burns and every other fugitive slave who might get to Boston citizens of Massachusetts? That is the position of the Senator and his State; for Governor Andrew ostentatiously published that if Lincoln would publish a proclamation of freedom to the slaves the roads and alleys would swarm with Massachusetts volunteers rushing to the war. Yet in a very short time afterwards the agents of Massachusetts, with the Senator's co-operation, were scouring the rebel and loyal States, the slave and the free States, offering large bounties for negro recruits, free, slave, and freedmen, to fill up her quota and keep her own white people from the war. Massachusetts is a great State, but her people have some queer notions, and always think their will ought to control. The member from Massachusetts says:

"Sir, the imputations, the reproaches, the slanders, that so glibly flow from the lips of the Senator from Kentucky will not reach the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. No word of his can soil her name or dim her fame. There is not strength enough in his arm to fling a shaft that shall strike that proud old Commonwealth."

The Senator attempts to pull on the buskins of Mr. Webster, and affects the terseness, dignity, and grandeur of his defense of Massachusetts against the assaults of Senator Hayne, of South Carolina. I advise his successor to quit his attempts to copy Mr. Webster; he only apes his model, and it is miserably bad apeing too; or some time, when he is attempting to swell himself to the stature of Mr. Webster, the scene of the frog and the ox may be reenacted. But I concede one of the positions of the member from Massachusetts: "No word of mine can soil her name or dim her fame." If she has not herself, or such of her degenerate sons as he have not soiled her name or dimmed her fame, they are safe from me. But let us examine that question a little further.

Her arrogant, dictatorial, and "rule-or-ruin" spirit broke forth in opposition to the acquisition of Louisiana during Mr. Jefferson's Administration, and she denounced the treaty by which that vast country was acquired, because of the want of constitutional power on the part of our Government to acquire foreign territory, and also of the impolicy of the measure. She made her similar arrogant condemnation of the treaty in which Spain ceded Florida to the United States. Throughout the war of 1812 with Great Britain, which was declared to protect Massachusetts seamen against impressment by that haughty Power, and to vindicate the freedom of the seas and the rights of international commerce, in which her people were so largely interested, that spirit became so heightened and deepened, so malignant and treasonable, as to break forth in the most vituperative condemnation of the war and our own Government by the people of Massachusetts; in frequent and most criminal attempts to thwart and defeat the United States in their great struggle to bring the war to a speedy and successful close; in a resort by them to manifold devices to weaken, dispirit, and produce the defeat of our land and naval forces, and to strengthen and give aid and comfort and victory to our enemy; in continual and most extravagant laudation of the policy, power, and moral position of England in that war, and the basest disparagement of their own country and Government by imputations of corruption and imbecility, of prejudice against England and subservency to France, and a purpose, not to redress national wrongs, but of rapacity, ambition, and conquest; in efforts to detach the thirteen original States and leave the Federal Government and the other States at war with one of the greatest Powers of the earth; and another most absurd and wicked project, that New England should make a separate peace with Great Britain, and at the end of the war its States should resume their position in the United States. These are grave charges, and most disparaging to Massachusetts, and it is to be deplored that they are true in their fullest force.

She elected a Governor and Legislature hostile to the Government of the United States and opposed to the war, and who exerted themselves continuously and defiantly to uphold the cause of England, and to coerce the President of the United States to make an ignominious treaty, without the concession or acknowledgment by Great Britain of a single right for which the war was undertaken.

Her people first got up the Essex Junto and then the Hartford Convention, both of which were treasonable associations, composed of the enemies of their own Government and the friends and sympathizers of England; and their objects and action were to divide our people, distract the public councils, weaken the military operations of the United States, and to make the war so disastrous as to force them to a shameful peace.

In the summer of 1812, some two months after the declaration of war, President Madison made a requisition on Governor Strong of that State for a portion of her militia to enter the service of the United States. He refused to comply; and in connection with his council submitted to the judges of the supreme court of that State several questions which it will not be necessary to read, as they are embodied in the answers of the judges. Those answers I will read:

To his Excellency the Governor and the Honorable Council of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

The undersigned, Justices of the supreme judicial court, have considered the several questions proposed by your Excellency and Honors for their opinion.

By the constitution of this State, the authority of commanding the militia of the Commonwealth is vested exclusively in the Governor, who has all the powers incident to the office of commander-in-chief; and is to exercise them personally, or by subordinate officers under his command, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the constitution and the laws of the land.

While the Governor of the Commonwealth remained in the exercise of these powers the Federal Constitution was ratified, by which was vested in the Congress a power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions, and to provide for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers. The Federal Constitution further provides that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

On the construction of the Federal and State constitutions must depend the answers to the several questions proposed. As the militia of the several States may be employed in the service of the United States for the three specific purposes of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and repelling invasions, the opinion of the judges is requested whether the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies aforesaid exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him pursuant to acts of Congress.

It is the opinion of the undersigned that this right is vested in the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States.

The Federal Constitution provides that when either of these exigencies exist the militia may be employed, pursuant to some act of Congress, in the service of the United States; but no power is given, either to the President or to the Congress, to determine that either of the said exigencies does in fact exist. As this power is not delegated to the United States by the Federal Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, it is reserved to the States respectively, and, from the nature of the power, it must be exercised by those with whom the States have respectively intrusted the chief command of the militia.

It is the duty of these commanders to execute this important trust agreeably to the laws of their several States respectively, without reference to the laws or officers of the United States, in all cases except those specially provided for in the Federal Constitution. They must, therefore, determine when either of the special cases exist obliging them to relinquish the execution of this trust, and to render themselves and the militia subject to the command of the President.

A different construction, giving to Congress the right to determine when those special cases exist, authorizing them to call forth the whole of the militia, and taking them from the commanders-in-chief of the several States and subjecting them to the command of the President, would place all the militia, in effect, at the will of Congress, and produce a military consolidation of the States, without any constitutional remedy, against the intentions of the people when ratifying the Federal Constitution. Indeed, since the passing of the act of Congress of February 23, 1795, vesting in the President the power of calling forth the militia when the exigencies mentioned in the Constitution shall exist, if the President has the power of determining when those exigencies exist, the militia of the several States is in fact at his command and subject to his control.

No inconveniences can reasonably be presumed to result from the construction which vests in the commanders-in-chief of the militia in the several States the right of determining when the exigencies exist obliging them to place the militia in the service of the United States. These exigencies are of such a nature that the existence of them can be easily ascertained by or made known to the commanders-in-chief of the militia; and, when ascertained, the public interest will induce a prompt obedience to the acts of Congress.

Another question proposed to the consideration of the justices is, whether, when either of the exigencies exist authorizing the employing of the militia in the service of the United States, the militia thus employed can be lawfully commanded by any officer but of the militia except by the President of the United States.

The Federal Constitution declares that the President shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. He may undoubtedly exercise this command by officers of the Army of the United States, by him commissioned according to law. The President is also declared to be the Commander-in-Chief of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. The officers of the militia are to be appointed by the States; and the President may exercise his command of the militia by the officers of the militia duly appointed. But we know of no constitutional provision authorizing any officer of the Army of the United States to command the militia, or authorizing any officer of the militia to command the Army of the United States. The Congress may provide laws for the government of the militia when in actual service; but to extend this power to the placing of them under the command of an officer not of the militia, except the President, would render nugatory the provision that the militia are to have officers appointed by the States.

The union of the militia in the actual service of the United States with the troops of the United States, so as to form one Army, seems to be a case not provided for or contemplated in the Constitution; &c.

Now, sir, this opinion decides two principles. It states correctly that there are three exigencies provided for by the Constitution in which the militia of the States may be called into the service of the United States: first, to execute the laws; second, to repel invasions; and third, to put down insurrection; but that opinion assumes as a constitutional principle that the power to decide when any or all these exigencies happen belongs not to Congress or to the President of the United States, but to the Governors of the States; and even when the Governors themselves have decided such an exigency to exist and have ordered their militia into the service of the United States, the militia can be commanded by no United States military officer, except by the President himself.

Sir, there is another specimen of Massachusetts loyalty—

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he will give way for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; not at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POWELL in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. The Governor of Massachusetts having refused to order the militia of that State into the service of the United States, some of the patriotic people of the district of Maine volunteered, and were placed by the President under the command of General William King. In the year 1813 the Legislature of that State passed a resolution inquiring of General King whether he had accepted any agency or commission from the United States, or received from them any arms or munitions by order of the President of the United States. General King replied:

"The volunteers who tendered their services to the President for the defense of their country were accepted and organized, and have been furnished with arms on application to the General Government. Soon after the commencement of the present war, when the services of the detached militia were withheld from the General Government, I aided the War Department in organizing such a volunteer corps as was considered necessary for the defense of this district. After two regiments were organized, the services of such a number of companies were offered as would have made three other regiments, if necessary. As a citizen of the United States I have duties to perform as well as a citizen of the State, in this just and holy war."

A response worthy the friend of that oft-tried and true patriot, John Holmes. Massachusetts afterwards asked and received pay, not for the services but for the time of the militia that she withheld from the United States in their second great struggle for independence.

This traitorous Governor Strong and his coadjutors in Massachusetts procured the weak and corrupt Governor of Vermont, Chittenden, to take their position, that it was the exclusive right of the Governors of the States to decide whether and when there existed an exigency that required the State militia to be put into the service of the United States, and to issue an infamous proclamation commanding the volunteer militia of Vermont to march back from Plattsburg, whither they had rushed to defend that place against the assault of one of the most formidable British armies that was assembled during the war. The traitors of Massachusetts were loud in their promises to stand by their victim, and to sustain him in their common crime; but their guilty souls shrank from the necessary action. The brave and patriotic citizen soldiers of Vermont flung back their contempt upon the treasonable missive of their Governor, who was representing, not his State, but British feelings and interests, and remained to cover themselves with glory in one of the most brilliant achievements of the war. All honor to the memory of those gallant and true men! They were fit representatives of the heroes of Bennington.

In May, 1813, Governor Strong sent a message to the Legislature of Massachusetts in which he reviewed all the grounds for the declaration of war by our Government against England, and argued each one in favor of our enemy; and concluded by charging the Government of the United States with having prostituted itself to subserve the purposes and ambition of Bonaparte. A committee of both Houses responded, echoing the sentiments of the Governor, and denounced the war as improper, unjust, and impolitic on the part of the United States, and asserted that—

"While the oppressed nations of Europe are making a magnanimous and generous effort against the common enemy of free States, we alone, the descendants of the Pilgrims, sworn free to civil and religious slavery, cooperate with the oppressor to bind nations in his chains and divert the forces of one of his enemies from the mighty conflict. Were not the territories of the United States sufficiently extensive before the annexation of Louisiana, the projected reduction of Canada, and the seizure of West Florida? Already have we witnessed the admission of a State beyond the territorial limits of the United States, peopled by inhabitants whose habits, language, religion, and laws are repugnant to the genius of our Government, in violation of the rights and interests of some of the parties to our national politics. The hardy people of the North stood in no need of the aid of the South to protect them in their liberties."

Such was the loyalty of Massachusetts to the United States in that dark and trying hour.

Josiah Quincy offered in the Senate of Massachusetts this preamble and resolution:

"Whereas a proposition has been made to this Senate for the adoption of sundry resolutions expressive of their sense of the gallantry and good conduct exhibited by Captain James Lawrence, commander of the United States ship-of-war Hornet, and the officers and crew of that ship, in the destruction of his Majesty's ship-of-war Peacock; and whereas it has been found that former resolutions of this kind passed on similar occasions relative to other officers engaged in a like service have given great discontent to many of the good people of this Commonwealth, it being considered by them as an encouragement and excitement to the continuance of the present unjust, unnecessary, and inglorious war, and on that account the Senate of Massachusetts have declined their duty to refrain from acting on the said propositions; and whereas, also, this determination of the Senate may, without explanation, be construed into an intentional slight of Captain Lawrence, and denial of his particular merits, the Senate therefore deem it their duty to declare that they have a high sense of the naval skill and military and civil virtues of Captain James Lawrence, and that they have been withheld on said proposition solely from considerations relative to the nature and principles of the present war. And to the end that all misrepresentations on this subject may be obviated:

"Resolved, (as the sense of the Senate,) That in a war like the present, waged without justifiable cause, and conducted in a manner that indicates that conquest and ambition are its real motives, it is not becoming a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits which are not immediately connected with the defense of our sea-coast and soil."

This resolution was adopted by the Senate of Massachusetts 15th June, 1813. If the present Senators from that State had been there, they would have voted for it; and if any Senator had introduced one in the same terms in relation to any of our heroes who have fallen in this war, they would have voted the expulsion of such Senator.

The British authorities claimed that many prisoners taken by their cruisers on board American ships, as well native-born as naturalized citizens, were the subjects of their king; and they were thrown into loathsome prisons for safekeeping, to be tried and hung, or shot, as traitors to George III. In retaliation, and to insure the safety of our unfortunate captive countrymen, a United States marshal lodged some English prisoners in the jail of Worcester, Massachusetts, she and most of the States having, soon after the Constitution went into operation, passed a law granting the use of her jails to the United States Government. A mob of Massachusetts traitors and British sympathizers attacked the Worcester jail in force, broke it open, and set free the British hostages. The Worcester Gazette applauded this act of treasonable violence, and denounced the United States marshal as "a lynx-eyed, full-blooded bloodhound of Mr. Madison." The Boston Advertiser exulted over the success of this infamous enterprise, and denominated the liberated English prisoners as "gallant officers whom Mr. Madison desired to answer for the lives of self-acknowledged traitors, victims of a barbarous and cruel policy."

Soon afterwards, the Legislature of Massachusetts, in consummation of the shame and crime of this affair, passed a law prohibiting the use of her jails to the United States even for the confinement of enemy prisoners to be held for the safety of our captive countrymen about to be executed by British authorities on fabricated charges of treason, &c. And that law authorized and required the keepers of all Massachusetts jails within thirty days from its passage to discharge any British prisoners that were confined in them.

At the gloomiest periods of the war, and when our country was most sorely pressed by her powerful foe, the Massachusetts traders and shippers took out licenses from the British consuls to carry supplies to her armies in Spain and Portugal where they were held from augmenting the armies operating against us in their great struggle with Bonaparte; and her people also smuggled on a large scale to furnish the English armies and fleets acting against us on this continent and its coasts. One of those licensed ships was captured by an American cruiser while on her illicit voyage to Spain; and her owners had the assurance, to be sure many years afterwards, to offer a petition to Congress to be paid by the United States for their ship and cargo.

The ground upon which the British party in Massachusetts urged the original thirteen States to abandon their Government and the other States, and also upon which it proposed and pressed the project that New England should make a separate treaty of peace with Great Britain was, that they were opposed to the war, and it was fatal to their interests. But what language can express adequate contempt for their purpose to skulk back into the Union when the war should have terminated? They themselves furnished the only parallel, and that was in hanging out blue-lights to instruct and lead the public enemy to their country's disaster. That scheme, the separate treaty, was strenuously advocated by the Boston Advertiser.

An embargo law was passed as one of the war measures of the United States; but it was denounced by the traitors of Massachusetts as void and of no effect; and by connivance between them and the British consuls, was so extensively evaded and defeated as to produce but small results.

That party and its presses habitually disparaged and sneered at the victories won by our armies over their English enemies.

After the battle of the Thames, the Salem Gazette announced:

"At length the handful of British troops, which for more than a year have baffled the numerous armies of the United States in the invasion of Canada, deprived of the genius of the immortal Brock, have been obliged to yield to superior power and numbers."

The Boston Advertiser published of that battle:

"We shall surrender all our conquests at a peace. It is indeed a hopeful exploit for Harrison, with five thousand troops, who have been assembling and preparing ever since July, 1812, to fight and conquer four hundred and fifty worn-out, exhausted British regulars, whom the Indians had previously deserted."

Another journal of the same class pronounced Harrison's victory to be "the triumph of a crowd of Kentucky savages over a handful of brave men—no more than a march and their capture without fighting."

Here, sir, is a most flagitious violation of the truth in relation to the force of the British in that battle. They were five times as much as these papers state them to have been.

The gallant Lawrence fell, in the unequal fight of the Chesapeake with the Shannon, on his bloody quarter-deck, and his last words, "Don't give up the ship," became the ocean slogan of America.

Another of our naval captains, Crowninshield, under a flag of truce, sailed for Halifax to bring to Salem the remains of Lawrence, and while he was on this sacred mission, and all the true men of the nation were mourning the untimely death of the hero, and Story had been appointed to speak his funeral oration, one Boston journal announced that this solemn errand had been undertaken "by the privateering captain, Crowninshield," and the Boston Advertiser asked with scoffing malevolence, "What honor can be paid where a Crowninshield is chief mourner, and a Story chief priest?" Governor Strong and his council, and most of the British party, had no honors or respect to pay to the martyrs in the cause of their country's rights and independence, and therefore they staid away from the funeral of Lawrence.

Two years and six months of war brought peace to our country, and notwithstanding Massachusetts had struck in her cause with feeble arm and traitor's heart, yet the nation's prowess on land and ocean won for her tacitly but forever the great international rights for which she had unsheathed the sword.

Under the stimulants of fishing bounties and high protective tariffs, Massachusetts industry and enterprise soon commenced greatly to prosper. She regarded with sullen but not very vociferous disapprobation the acquisition of Florida. She probably would have been more demonstrative if the negotiator had not been her own Adams. When Texas was about to be annexed she became very eruptive, and not only reprobated the acquisition of foreign territory by joint resolution of Congress, but reiterated her ancient and uniform position, that it could not be legitimately done by the treaty-making power of our Government. Her Legislature passed these resolutions:

"Resolved, That there has hitherto been no precedent of the admission of foreign territory into the Union by legislation, and as the powers of legislation granted in the Constitution of the United States to Congress do not embrace the case of the admission of a foreign State or foreign territory by legislation into the Union, such an act of admission would have no binding force whatever upon the people of Massachusetts."

"Resolved, That the power never having been granted by the people of Massachusetts to admit into the Union States and Territories not within the same when the Constitution was adopted, remains with the people, and can only be exercised in such manner as the people hereafter shall designate and appoint."

It being the deliberate and oft-repeated judgment of Massachusetts that the United States Government had no power to acquire Louisiana, Florida, and Texas, and that their acquisition was detrimental to some of the States, and particularly to Massachusetts, and she having been to so recent a period vociferous and even frantic in the expression of her desire and purpose that the free States should cut loose from slavery and the slave States, one would have thought that she would have rushed to the acceptance of secession by the rebel States. Except a few crazy fanatics her people had always conceded fully that the Constitution and the Union protected slavery in the slave States. Mr. Webster, and all her eminent jurists and statesmen, except John Q. Adams, admitted the truth of that proposition, without any qualification or restriction whatever, and it was because there was no other escape from the protection which the Union and the Constitution gave to slavery that they were both to be repudiated by the abolitionists.

But the abolition party within a few years had got possession of the government of Massachusetts; and an extreme anti-slavery party, at the presidential election of 1856, had manifested a most rapid and extraordinary growth. Here was a new prospect breaking upon her radicals. They were not only meddling and fanatical, they not only loved money, but also power. She had always dominated and hectored over New England, and now opportunity was coming when, by alertness, daring, and decision, she could throw herself at the head of the great new movement, and assume in the nation and its councils the position and controlling influence which she had maintained in New England from the beginning. She would become the leading State of the United States; and above all, she could minister to hollow philanthropy, fierce fanaticism, and insatiable avarice, by procuring the slaves and lands of the rebels to be confiscated, and appropriating to herself the lion's share. She has entered upon this bold, ambitious, and wicked enterprise, driven on by the combined motive-power of all her leading characteristics, each one being highly stimulated by it.

A strong ingredient with the Massachusettsmen also is this sentiment: "I have no slave; there is none who call me master; and in that respect no one shall be above me, and I'll bring all to my level." Never were there truer representatives of that sentiment than her two Senators. Never were there more unworthy and unsafe lights for a great people than they and those whom they represent.

In the excess of their hostility to slavery and slaveowners, I am at a loss to decide which dominates, the madman or the fiend. They show all the infernal malice of the one and the uncontrollable fury of the other. The English language has hardly any term of reproach and obloquy that they have not each, again and again, hurled at slavery and slaveowners. "The pollution of slavery," "the great sin of mankind," "the shame and disgrace of the age," "the foulest stain on Christendom," "the degrading effects of slavery," "the demoralizing influences of slavery," "the brutalizing influences of slavery," "the deformities and degradation of character produced by slavery," "slave-aristocracy," "slave-oligarchy," "slave-mongers," "slave-hunters," "slave-catchers," "slave-breeders," "slave-stealers," and "slave-pirates," are some of the epithets most prodigally used by those Senators in debate in this Chamber.

Sir, since the beginning of the present generation a new disease has sprung up in the United States. It is sometimes called "nigger on the brain;" and I have never known two subjects that had it in a greater degree of violence than the two Senators from Massachusetts. The negro has made these two Senators. The worship of the negro and their demagoging in relation to him have given them public position and office, and brought them to the Senate of the United States. They have made the negro a hobby. Both have jumped astride of him, and it is impossible to determine which one is before and which one is behind. I believe they alternate their positions in that respect. But, sir, they fulfill the Scripture in one point. We are commanded to remember our Creator in the days of our youth. The negro has created those two Senators; and from their youth to the present time they have been worshipping him with an eastern devotion, and they will continue this idolatry to the end of their lives. If they were to cease it Othello's occupation would be gone.

Let me read one or two passages from the speeches of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in relation to the negro and a dissolution of the Union. In a speech delivered at Faneuil Hall, November 2, 1855, the Senator used these words:

"Not that I love the Union less but freedom more do I now in pleading this great cause insist that freedom at all hazards shall be preserved. God forbid that for the sake of the Union we should sacrifice the very thing for which the Union was made."

What is his position? That the Union was made for negro freedom? Well, sir, it was a long day coming. The Union was first made in 1774, when the old Articles of Confederation were adopted. Independence was declared in 1776, and the present Constitution was framed in 1787, all for the white man, and the negro was never known or dreamed of in any of those great transactions; and yet the honorable Senator says that the Union was made for the freedom of the negro!

On the 19th and 20th of May, 1856, in a speech delivered in the Senate, that Senator held this revolutionary language:

"Already the muster has begun. The strife is no longer local, but national. Even now while I speak, portents hang on all the arches of the horizon, threatening to darken the broad land, which already yawns with the mullerings of civil war. The fury of the propagandists of slavery and the calm determination of their opponents are now diffused from the distant Territory over wide-spread communities, and the whole country in all its extent—marshaling hostile divisions, and foreshadowing a strife, which, unless happily averted by the triumph of freedom, will become war—fratricidal, patricidal war—with an accumulated wickedness beyond the wickedness of any war in human annals."

The gentleman's words were prophecy. They are in terrible course of execution; and he has given all the agency and energy to this war and revolution for the dissolution of the Union to put down slavery that he could command.

I will read one other passage from a speech by that Senator. In a debate in the Senate, June 26, 1854, Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, asked that Senator this question:

"I would like to ask the Senator, if Congress repealed the fugitive slave law, would Massachusetts execute the constitutional requirements, and send back to the South the absconding slaves?"

"Mr. SUMNER. Do you ask if I would send back slaves?"

"Mr. BUTLER. Why, yes."

"Mr. SUMNER. Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

"Mr. BUTLER. Then you would not obey the Constitution. Sir, standing here before this tribunal, where you swore to support it, you rise and tell me that you regard it the office of a dog to support it. You stand in my presence, a coequal Senator, and tell me it is a dog's office to execute the Constitution of the United States."

"Mr. SUMNER. I recognize no such obligation."

What obligation? No obligation to support the Constitution of the United States as it relates to the rendition of fugitive slaves. What exempted that Senator from that obligation? Had he not taken an oath to support the Constitution as a totality? What right had he to make any mental reservation? What right had he to except the fugitive slave law, or a provision of the Constitution which every man who swears to support it swears to sustain, to render back fugitive slaves? Sir, if a violation of the oath, taken in the broad terms in which the Senator has always taken it when he qualified as a member of this body, had been by law made perjury, and the Senator had violated that oath, as he has violated it so often, and he had been arraigned on the charge of perjury before any enlightened and independent court, what would have been the judgment?

Now, sir, I will proceed a little with the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] They are par nobile fratrum. I do not know, according to their ideas, which is the grandest and greatest. According to my own I do not know which is least, which is most false to the Constitution and to the loyalty that is justly due to their Government and to the Constitution and Union of these States. They come in here and make an exhibit of this almost daily that is abhorrent to every man who has any moral principle.

But, sir, the other Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the representative of war, "horrid war," in the Senate, declared in a speech at Syracuse, New York, October 23, 1859:

"I tell you, fellow-citizens, the Harper's Ferry outbreak was the legitimate consequence of the teachings of the Republican party."

Sir, that is the truth, and it is a lesson which the Senator sought to inculcate; which every traitor who meditated the dissolution of the Union and the deprivation of the slave-owners of the South of the protection and guarantee which that instrument gave to their property—it was a lesson leading to an act which they all meditated. Sir, what can we think of a man who so boldly and defiantly announces it? There was a murderous, bloody, and treasonable raid by John Brown upon the Commonwealth of Virginia, carrying blood and violence and treason and crime into a peaceful community, far distant from his residence; and the Senator avows that this act was the legitimate result of the teachings, as everybody knows that it was, of the Republican party.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. DAVIS. I prefer you to wait until I get through.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that the records of the Senate show that that statement is not correct. I never made any such assertion. Mr. Hunter once brought it up in the Senate, and I referred to the speech which I actually made, in which I stated precisely the opposite doctrine.

Mr. DAVIS. I accept the Senator's explanation. I withdraw that charge; but I will bring up another, and see what answer he will make to that.

On the 20th day of November, 1859—

"A large and enthusiastic meeting of the citizens of this town [Natick, Massachusetts] was called to consider the following resolutions:

"Whereas resistance to tyrants is obedience to God: Therefore,

"Resolved, That it is the highest duty of the slaves to resist their masters; and it is the right and duty of the people of the North to incite slaves to resistance and aid them in it."

My information is that that Senator was present at this meeting when this resolution passed, and that it passed nemine contradicente, and the Senator's voice was not raised in remonstrance against the atrocity of the sentiment expressed in that resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator wish an explanation now?

Mr. DAVIS. Is it any denial?

Mr. WILSON. I have to say simply this: that was a meeting called by some anti-slavery men whom we denominate in our country as the "Garrison abolitionists." Some seven or eight hundred persons went to the meeting as lookers-on, and did not vote or disturb the meeting, or take any part in it. Probably not over seven or eight men voted on that resolution, or had any part in it. Not one in twenty of those who were present had any sympathy with the meeting; but it was a meeting called by other persons, and they did not wish to interfere with it. My own views were fully expressed at the time in a letter denying any sympathy with it whatever, and in condemnation of it.

Mr. DAVIS. I accept the Senator's explanation; but I think he was at a very improper place, and in very bad company. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I will say one word as to negro insurrections, and in relation to the policy of the Government in arming and organizing negro soldiers. I have some knowledge of negro nature. I have studied it from my infancy. I know of no people that have kinder or more benevolent feelings toward a race whom they deem to be their inferiors than have the slaveholders of Kentucky toward their slaves. I know of no slaveholder who would not imperil his life if it were necessary to defend his slave from wrong and violence. If to support this war in its just and proper conduct in the proper mode of carrying it on, slavery had fallen as a necessary consequence, I know of no man in the State of Kentucky who is for the Union that would have made any complaint. It would have presented itself to them in this aspect: here is an alternative, the preservation of the Union or the overthrow of slavery; and my colleague of the other House, who owns about two hundred slaves, and every slaveholder in the State who is a Union man, would have yielded his slaves, just as he would any of his other property; to the exigencies of the war and to the just demands of the Government in carrying it on. All that was asked was that slaves should share the fate of other property in this war; that the war should not be carried on for their defense nor for the destruction of the institution. We believed that all policy to make slaves a component part of the Army would result disastrously to the Government and to the country, and I have no doubt whatever that this has proved true. But we protested and will continue to protest against making war upon the property of loyal people.

Mr. President, I know the nature of the slaves of that population. There have been contemplated slave insurrections in Virginia; some in the State of Kentucky. We all know the extent of the outrages that ensued in the insurrection of the slaves of San Domingo. This is a general law in relation to the white and black races: the black race desires the white race; and whenever there is an insurrection consummated, or suppressed in its embryo, the leaders of the insurrection generally select in anticipation for themselves the handsomest and most attractive white women for their wives. That is a law of the race; and wherever there is an extensive insurrection, and violence and passion and lust obtain the ascendant, the outrageous enormities that are and will be perpetrated by the black race are fearful and too horrid to narrate. Nevertheless, I will recite one that occurred on the Bayou Teche in western Louisiana.

It was communicated to me by a citizen of one of those parishes on that bayou, a Mr. Carlie, a Spanish creole, a loyal man, a gentleman, a man of intelligence, and of as true integrity to the Government and the Union as there is in it. He had a son who had reached the years of manhood. He urged the noble and educated youth to take a position in the Army as a private, that he might learn the art of war and acquire the capacity for subordinate command. The young man did so. He served out his time, and at the end his father procured him a second lieutenantcy. He returned to Virginia to join his regiment and assume his command; but before he reached their rendezvous they had left for Gettysburg. He followed on, and reached Gettysburg during the protracted conflict. He shouldered his musket, took his position as a private in the ranks, and there poured out his young life, and it and all the bright hopes of a fond father were offered there upon the altar of his country.

His father narrated to me this fact. There was a Mr. Bouchet, a creole planter on the Bayou Teche, a man of wealth, of education, and of refinement. He was aged, was paralytic, and helpless. The march of armies drove from his neighborhood all of his friends, leaving him and his motherless daughter exposed and unprotected. A negro soldier wearing the uniform of the United States came to this defenseless house, and there, in the presence of the powerless father, violated the person of his daughter.

Sir, that is one only of the many and untold and most horrid incidents that have no doubt characterized this war. Shame and ruin, mute despair, and blasted hopes of happiness have silenced the voice forever of most of the victims of such diabolical lust. Mr. President, could there be a stronger case than this appealing to manhood—man the natural protector of woman—to turn from the policy that brings such heartrending enormities? But, sir, such instances as these would be brought up in vain to cause to relent the fanatical, fierce, and frenzied and perverted hearts and souls of the Senators from Massachusetts. At such recitations they would turn with the sardonic smile of fiends from the white woman's direst woe, from the ruin of all that is innocent and lovely in the most cultivated and attractive of the sex of the white race.

Already it is said that the white population in some of the southern States where the negroes have been enlisted are fleeing to places of concealment and safety. The negroes know these hiding-places, and the secret ways and paths to them, and they are organized into the Army, and it is boasted that they are already upon the hunt of their victims. I can fancy the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] in a position where he would feel something of the pride and the glory and valor of war according to the scale and dignity of his courage and great soul. It would be heading one of those black regiments, those fiends inflamed by infernal passions, and leading them on to hunt out, to murder, or to bring to a fate more horrible than murder, these fleeing and helpless women and children.

But, sir, I have something more to say to that Senator. When I took my seat in this body I found him always the most forward and most reckless assailant of property in negroes. According to his judgment, I had the audacity to remonstrate against a series of systematic measures which he introduced to assail and destroy that property. I did this because of the great interests of my constituents in it, and because of the foul injustice and iniquity of the policy generally. I never could say a word by way of remonstrance, argument, reason, or expostulation against those measures without receiving the coarse and the insulting rebuke of that Senator.

I recollect on one occasion he called me to order for speaking treasonable words, as he assumed. He was required by the occupant of the chair to reduce the words to writing. He recited them—I do not recollect whether he reduced them to writing or not—but I pronounced the words as he reduced them to writing, or stated them, to be untrue and false in fact. He called upon the reporter. The reporter read his report of my words, and it corroborated my version and contradicted that of the Senator, and then the matter dropped.

Sir, the Senator has been a sort of general whipper-in, not only of the Black Republican party, but of the whole Senate. He has assumed to rebuke, to chide, to domineer, to bully Senators at his pleasure, without much regard to their political position. Sir, I think there ought to be inscribed on his most impudent front the words, "The self-constituted gagger of the Senate."

Mr. WILSON. I call the Senator to order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator, in the opinion of the Chair, is out of order. Such language is unbecoming a Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I will withdraw it, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say in regard to the words about which I called the Senator to order that he knows, as does every Senator about me, that I have never undertaken to dictate to anybody or to bully anybody or to treat anybody unkindly. If I have uttered an unkind word to a member in the heat and excitement of debate I have always been prompt to tender an apology, and am always willing to do it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator knows the contrary.

Mr. WILSON. I leave it to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. There is the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. CARLILE,] who received the rudest and most insulting rebuke from that Senator that I have ever heard delivered in a deliberative body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a question of order. The whole tenor of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, for the last hour at least, has been, as it seems to me, a personal attack upon the Senators from Massachusetts, and is clearly out of order. It is always a painful sensation to me to rise to a question of order upon any Senator; but I feel constrained either to call the Senator to order or to leave the Senate Chamber. I think it beneath the dignity of the body to sit here and allow these personal attacks to go on at such interminable length. I could pardon it if it was a single expression in the heat of the moment; but when it is so continuous and at such great length, I think it entirely out of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to say one word in explanation. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] made three speeches for my expulsion from the Senate. How many opprobrious epithets and what abusive and vituperative language did he use and pile up against me in each and all of them?

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 45.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon that subject I remember that the Senator from Kentucky spoke twice, I think, at great length; and in the course of his remarks I am quite confident that he indulged as much perhaps in the use of adjectives and epithets as any other Senator in the course of that debate. But I supposed that that question was disposed of, and that that was not now the subject-matter of controversy; that the personal question had passed by. At all events, the time of the Senate is too precious to be thus wasted, and I think the dignity of the body ought to be preserved above such personal vituperation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think—

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair, on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, did rule that in his opinion the Senator from Kentucky was out of order; that it was unparliamentary and undignified, at least, to use the epithets which the Senator uttered. Such language is certainly not in accordance with parliamentary law, and the Chair so rules.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator therefore is now under the control of the Senate, and he cannot proceed, under the rules of the Senate, without the leave of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. In calling the Senator to order, I did not by any means intend to prevent him going on with his speech. I hope he will be allowed to finish his speech. I thought the language certainly of an unparliamentary character, and I wished also to say a word in reply at the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Kentucky will proceed in order.

Mr. GRIMES. I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If objected to, then it must be a vote of the Senate that will authorize him to go on.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the Senate will permit the Senator to proceed. I concur entirely with the member from Wisconsin and the Chair, that a great deal of what has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky is not suited to the forum in which he is. A debate carried on in that spirit, the spirit of invective and personal crimination, answers no good and can answer no good, and, in my opinion, is attended by nothing but mischief. The Senator from Kentucky, however, has perhaps some excuse (for in my judgment he can have but an excuse, not a justification) in the course which the Senator from Massachusetts, who has called him to order, himself pursued. I understand him now to be replying to what has fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts throughout the debate. In the speech with which the Senator from Massachusetts first supported his resolution of expulsion, which was written out, if I recollect aright, and which was read by the member from Massachusetts, there were a great many things that I am sure he would not have inserted if he had reflected at the time upon their effect, and the rights and the feelings of the member from Kentucky, and upon the decorum, if he will permit me to say so, that should characterize the debates of this body.

I regretted it very much at the time, and I have regretted it ever since, and when the Senator from Kentucky in reply dealt in terms of crimination, which I suppose he would not have done but for what he believed to be a sufficient provocation, I suggested—without saying to whom—that I thought the Senator was going rather beyond the license which parliamentary rules gave him, and the answer I got was that it was true, but it was justified by what had fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts.

When the resolution of expulsion was about to be withdrawn, as the Senate will recollect, the Senator from Massachusetts, instead of asking leave to withdraw it, as I was in hopes he would have done, without making any explanation except such as was necessary to justify his withdrawing it, indulged in very severe remarks. His personal invective, as it seemed to me, was as bitter as anything I have heard from the Senator from Kentucky. It was because, as I suppose, of the last remarks of the member from Massachusetts and his opening remarks that the Senator from Kentucky thought himself justified in adopting the same course. But the Senate have already told him by the decision of the Chair, which nobody finds fault with, I am sure, but which everybody approves, that that kind of debate is not within the parliamentary rules of the Senate and the license which they give, and not suited to the decorum of the Senate. I am satisfied, therefore, that, with the reflection with which the Senator from Kentucky thinks at all times, he will see that it is not only due to the body and due to the Senator from Massachusetts, but due to himself, that in further prosecuting the debate he should abstain very cautiously from indulging in personal crimination.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me a word, I hope there will be no objection to the Senator from Kentucky going on and concluding his speech. I certainly should not have risen to a point of order if I had supposed that it would have interrupted the course of his speech.

The Senator from Maryland has alluded to my remarks on a former occasion. The Senator spoke to me personally the other day in regard to one expression of my speech, and I told him that I certainly did not wish to be understood to mean what some persons had inferred I did mean in that remark. In my remarks then, and in withdrawing the resolution, while I spoke and criticised plainly the language of the Senator from Kentucky, I do not know that I uttered a word to demean or to degrade him or to wound his feelings—nothing more than what I supposed to be legitimate debate. If I have ever done so toward any man in the Senate, it has always caused me more pain than it did that person, I am sure.

The Senator in his reply, it will be remembered, spoke very freely, and traveled, as I thought, out of the record, and I felt that I had a right to complain of it. He referred to anonymous information, &c.; and certainly anybody who will turn back and will read the debates will see that that Senator indulged very freely in comments and in remarks upon me personally. He has done so to-day to a considerable extent, and held me responsible for meetings which I have never heard of and never attended, and for one meeting, I think, in particular, in regard to which I wrote a letter condemning it, which was published in the Louisville Journal, which I have in my possession, with nearly a column of commendation for its devotion to the country, its nationality, and spirit of patriotism. I refer to the Worcester meeting. I hope, however, the Senator will be permitted to go on and finish his speech in his own way.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask leave of the Senate and the Chair to make a remark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will make his remark, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senator makes his remark, if the Senate will pardon me, I wish to say I am not aware that since the Senator has been in this body I have ever made any allusion to him in debate. Certainly I took no part in the discussion the other day to which reference has been made.

Mr. DAVIS. I concede that.

Mr. SUMNER. I mean now simply to add that the Senator is perfectly welcome to go on just as long as the Senate will listen, and attack me till doomsday.

Mr. GRIMES. I supposed that the controversy between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] and the Senator from Kentucky was settled some days ago; and I did not think that it comported with the dignity of the Senate, saying nothing about the dignity and character of the Senator from Kentucky himself, for him to come in here after having gathered up everything in connection with the history of Massachusetts, or what he supposed was disparaging to that State, or in connection with the past political career of the Senators from Massachusetts, and vomit it here in the presence of the Senate. But if Senators see fit to continue to listen for two successive days to a speech of this description, I suppose I can stand it as long as they can. In withdrawing my objection I wish it distinctly understood that I only withdraw it upon the condition that the Senator from Kentucky shall hereafter proceed in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the rule. If, therefore, there be no objection, the Senator from Kentucky will proceed in order. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator will therefore proceed in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I make my acknowledgments to the Senate for this privilege, and I will make this remark in connection with it: it has been the rule of my life never to be an aggressor, and where I, from the heat of the moment or any other infirmity, become an aggressor, the greatest pleasure that can be afforded me is to make the amende honorable at once. But it is an irrepressible principle of my nature, and I cannot avoid its operation, that just as any Senator or any gentleman meets me in the Senate or out of the Senate, precisely in the same temper and manner do I reply to him. Now, sir, I do not wish to attempt to abuse the privilege the Senate has granted me, but I do claim here, after the three speeches of the Senator, the amount of abuse, contumely, reproach, opprobrious epithets that he threw upon me—"babbling fool," "liar," "that is a lie," "ferce," "savage," "brutal," "false"—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a single word there?

Mr. DAVIS. In reply to my statement about your refusal to help a man to remove his wounded and dying son, you said it was a lie, an unmitigated lie.

Mr. WILSON. You said that you had it on information. I said your informant was an unmitigated liar. I did not mean to say that you originated it or told a lie.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understood it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The member from Kentucky will permit me to say a word before he goes on. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say in his place just now that, whatever he may have said on a former occasion, he had no purpose at all to wound the feelings of the Senator from Kentucky, and I think that should be a sufficient satisfaction, and I submit it with due deference to the better judgment of the Senator himself.

Mr. DAVIS. I will wholly forego the personal notice which I intended to take of the Senator from Massachusetts. I felt that I had an account, to settle with him, and it was my purpose to have a full settlement; but I acquiesce in the judgment of the Senate, and I will now proceed to the legitimate conclusion of my speech, the terms of which I suppose will be literally in order. It would dovetail a little better if I could have got the interlude; but, be that as it may, I will proceed. Before which I will set the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] right on a few points of fact. The Senator from Massachusetts opened the debate on the resolution for my expulsion in a written speech, full of personal invective and coarse abuse. I replied at length, but no other speech. The Senator immediately rejoined in a very abusive and vituperative speech. Some days afterwards the Senator withdrew his resolution, but, before doing so, made another speech fraught with gross personalities. I had made a summary from all the Senator's speeches of his many attacks upon me personally, and intended to square the account. The Senate have cut me off from that privilege, and I think have done me injustice; but I must submit to its judgment, and will conclude my remarks.

Mr. President, the people of Massachusetts, as a whole, have always been strongly marked. Intellectual, energetic, active, latently brave, arrogant, conceited, inquisitive, meddlesome, not satisfied to manage their own business but ever trying to take charge of other people's, communicative yet secretive, alert, inventive, covetous, selfish, practical in business, ideal in doctrine, rational and skeptical in religion, with a moral sense consisting rather of habit than sentiment, swaying from one extreme opinion to another, and in all dogmatical, intolerant, fanatical, persecuting, and cruel, her people cherish and hug to their bosom all their peculiarities, though many of them are revolting deformities.

It is seen from this sketch that her characteristics are strikingly and extensively mixed, giving efficiency at the same time for great mischief and great good. Yet no State of the Union, and few communities of her numbers in any age, have produced a larger aggregate of mind or more numerous or higher specimens of individual men. At the era of the Revolution she gave, not only to the colonies but to mankind, Franklin, the Adamsses, Hancock, Quincy, Warren, and Prescott, and Copley; in the succeeding generation, King, John Quincy Adams, Story, and Parsons, Whitmore, Whitney, Bowditch; and at a later day Everett, Davis, Choate, Winthrop, and Cushing, Shaw, Parker, and the Curtises, Hilliard, Hillard, and Thomas, Prescott, Bancroft, and Motley, Longfellow and Bryant, Perkins and Healy, Morse, Story the sculptor, and Morton, and a host of others who have shed unfading luster not only upon their own names but upon America. High above all of them, that product of New Hampshire and development of Massachusetts, is the intellectual giant, Daniel Webster, who as a constitutional lawyer, Senator, and Secretary, is without a peer. In Plato, Bacon, Burke, and Webster, man made his grandest development of pure intellect; while oratory and statesmanship have had their highest illustrations in Demosthenes, Cicero, Chatham, and Clay.

Massachusetts has had one unadulterated heroic age, commencing with the dawn of the troubles of the colonies with the mother country and coming down to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. During that eventful period there is no stain upon her escutcheon. She was about to act a first and principal part with the other colonies in a great political drama, involving not only the destiny of them all, and of a continent, but which was to influence materially the woof and color of the world's after-history. In mind, enlarged views, and wise statesmanship; in a just and true appreciation of her rights and duties, and those of the other colonies; in courage, fortitude, wisdom, disinterestedness, and moral principle, she was up to the great occasion. She was in singleness possessed of and inspired by true, noble, unselfish, and patriotic purposes, and throughout all the perils and trials of that momentous time Massachusetts showed no weakness, but always strength and greatness. She made no mistakes, she committed no crimes, no excesses. Her people had the good sense to call for the counsel and guidance of her wise, virtuous, and great men, and the fruits were for the colonies nationality and independence, and for herself one of the purest and brightest chapters in history.

The shock of England's oppressive policy for the colonies first struck Massachusetts. She at once invoked the aid of the southern colonies, and it was rendered not only without hesitation, but with heartiness for a common cause. They knew that one fate awaited them all. In the imperishable language of Mr. Webster, "Shoulder to shoulder they went through the Revolution, hand to hand they stood around the Administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support." Purified by the bloody ordeal of the long war, and instructed by the inefficiency of the Articles of Confederation in peace, the Constitution was the product of all the lessons of their experience, of their concessions, and of their harmonized counsels. It was the consummation of all their work, the perfection of man's statesmanship. If it were possible for the people of the United States to uphold, to guard, and defend it in the same spirit in which it was formed it would be perpetual; the degree of its security will always be proportioned to the prevalence of that spirit.

But after a time Massachusetts swung away from the great political principles and ends to which she had so steadily adhered for more than a generation. She has since been working with all her characteristic activity, energy, and audacity for the overthrow of that wonderful fabric of government in the building up of which she bore so conspicuous a part. She has kept up an incessant attack upon all its compromises except those which redound to her own advantage. She has repudiated all her able and enlightened national men, with their broad and statesmanlike views of Constitution, laws, and policy; she has surrendered to sectionalists, radicals, and factionists, to knaves and demagogues, to factitious philanthropists and clerical politicians and hypocrites, to men of one idea, and fatally bent on carrying that out, though Constitution and liberty thereby perish, to mannikins in intellect and soul, who are wholly incapable of her wise and good government, or any just appreciation of her relations, duties, and obligations both to the United States and the other States. She has permitted men, who can ruin but not rule, to make her one of the principal architects of the great national ills that are upon us.

She once garnered for herself and the whole country a great crop of imperishable glory; but she is now working as efficiently as the southern rebels for its degradation and ruin. When she shall have returned to her old political moorings, to the principles and spirit that ruled her when the foundations of our Government were laid, and shall have thrown from herself the perverted and deformed dwarfs that now beset her like a legion of horrible incubuses, and have called back into her service her able, patriotic, and virtuous statesmen, the work of reunion and reconstruction will be speedily consummated. For that mighty work then, indeed, would Massachusetts be potential.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVY SUPPLIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting, in compliance with resolution of the House, a statement in reference to supplies furnished for the Navy.

Mr. FENTON moved that the papers be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, approved May 15, 1856; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HARDING, by unanimous consent, presented the following joint resolutions of the State of Kentucky; which were read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
FRANKFORT, KENTUCKY, January 25, 1864.

To the President of the Senate, and Congress of the United States:

I herewith transmit joint resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky in regard to the payment of claims of loyal citizens of Kentucky, and most earnestly urge the national Government to provide, as early as practicable, some expeditious and equitable mode of ascertaining said claims, and have their prompt payment secured.

In many instances, the sufferers are reduced to absolute want, and reparation is demanded by every consideration of justice and humanity.

THO. E. BRAMLETTE,

By the Governor:
E. L. VAN WINKLE, Secretary of State.

Resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure the passage of a bill to reimburse Kentucky for loss sustained by rebel raids.

Whereas a bill has been introduced, or is about being introduced, into the Congress of the United States, to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for their losses sustained in the Morgan raid; and whereas Kentucky is one of the United States, and as loyal as any State in the Union, and has been subjected, not only to Morgan raids, but rebel raids of every kind, since the beginning of this accursed rebellion, a large portion of her territory having been devastated and many of her citizens having lost their all: Therefore,

1. Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their every effort to procure the passage of a bill to reimburse Kentucky for losses sustained by rebel raids of all kinds.

2. That our Governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions immediately to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved January 20, 1864.

SALE OF GOLD BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any surplus gold in the Treasury.

Mr. COX. I object to that now.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN CALIFORNIA, ETC.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate bill No. 51, amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any objection to that bill. It relates to the circuit and district courts of California and Oregon, and fixes the time for holding them, and the practice in the same.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has it been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WILSON. It has been reported from that committee. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO REENLISTING VETERANS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to veteran soldiers who have reenlisted in the Army; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO OREGON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of military roads in that State.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. I think that a bill of that magnitude ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by his Private Secretary, Mr. NICOLAY.

SALE OF GOLD BY THE UNITED STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection to my reporting the bill I have indicated from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COX. I will if the gentleman will not call for the previous question, and will answer one or two questions.

Mr. HOOPER. I am willing to agree to that. Mr. COX. How much gold is there in the Treasury? Next, what is the object of selling it at this time—the peculiar urgency? And what, in the judgment of the gentleman, will be the effect of throwing so much gold upon the market? Will it cause a convulsion in our commercial system?

Mr. BROOKS. I wish it understood that this discussion is to proceed by unanimous consent, reserving our right to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object. I think that gold will bring more after a little.

STREET RAILROAD IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the construction of a railroad in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me, that I may be allowed to state the reasons why the Committee of Ways and Means bill respecting the sale of gold ought to be reported and acted on this morning, and why I think it will require little if any debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his demand for the regular order of business?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are two gentlemen asking this favor at my hands. My friend from Wisconsin asked me first, and I will yield to him.

MILITARY ROAD IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. McINDOE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to build a military road to Lake Superior; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa appeals to me to be heard, and I withdraw my demand, if the House does not object.

SALE OF GOLD BY THE UNITED STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. KASSON. The bill to which the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, asks the attention of the House this morning, rests upon this condition of facts: the large importations into the country have deposited in the Treasury of the United States an amount of gold beyond the demands of the Treasury for the payment of interest and for all disbursements which by law are required to be made in gold. The consequence has been to withdraw from the market in the leading centers of commerce so large an amount of gold as to seriously embarrass the regular merchant in getting the gold necessary to discharge his liability in gold to the Government of the United States, and has necessarily caused a rise of gold in the market, thus putting the Government in the position of being really, in the technical term of the brokers' board, the principal "bull" in the New York market.

Unless, therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to relieve this condition of things in New York, the inevitable tendency will be eventually to enhance the price of gold and increase the difference between gold and the common currency of the country. Last Saturday, for instance, the payment into the United States custom-house at New York amounted to over half a million dollars, and all of it was obliged to be paid in gold. So from day to day the amount of gold in the Treasury of the United States at New York is increasing, and the facilities of merchants in New York to obtain gold are diminished.

It is for these reasons that the Committee of Ways and Means have authorized this report to be made to the House, that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized, not necessarily to sell the entire amount at once, or in any limited time, but to dispose of some amount of the gold in the Treasury from time to time, as the surplus will allow, and put it upon the market to an amount sufficient to meet the legitimate and constant demand created by the laws of the United States on the part of the merchants of the city of New York and of other commercial places. I believe on yesterday the price of gold ran up to sixty-one premium. If the Secretary is authorized to place in the market from time to time, and thus to restore to the commercial channels of the city, the surplus in the Treasury, the inevitable effect will be to keep down the price of gold to a rate more nearly corresponding to the legitimate demand for the regular transactions of commerce.

It is for this reason, and because the merchants of that and other cities need gold daily for making their payments to the Government itself, that the Committee of Ways and Means ask very early action upon the part of the House, so that the merchants may be relieved, and the importers, who require this gold daily, may have an opportunity to get it without paying the enormous premium created by those who deal in it purely as a matter of speculation, and who enhance the price in proportion as the stock accumulates in the vaults of the Government.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a bill of great importance, and one which should not be hurriedly passed. In the first place, the Secretary of the Treasury has the control of all the paper money of the country. He is the great rag baron.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to object to the introduction of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is on the floor and speaking by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the resolution is not to be introduced by unanimous consent, I shall object to continuing this discussion.

Mr. BROOKS. I do object to discussion upon one side with no discussion upon the other.

Mr. KASSON. My object was to make this explanation of facts to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object unless the bill is brought before the House by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. This debate has proceeded by unanimous consent pending the question of its introduction.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish, then, the gentleman from Iowa would ask the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I intended to object to the introduction of this resolution and to any debate upon the question unless it is to be open to general debate in the House. I did not understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] was speaking by unanimous consent, or I certainly should have objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the question distinctly as to whether the House would grant unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We did not hear it here. The SPEAKER. The gentleman was probably engaged in private conversation; but the Chair did ask unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Possibly; but I did not intend to object to the resolution being considered provided it should be open to general discussion in the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object now?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do unless the discussion is to be open.

The SPEAKER. Then the joint resolution is not before the House.

Mr. KASSON. I will state that I have not proposed to debate the joint resolution, but simply to explain the facts which led the Committee of Ways and Means to urge its early consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and therefore the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman object to the joint resolution being introduced to-day and made the special order for to-morrow?

Mr. RADFORD. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a question of privilege, as the House is now acting under the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I propose, if the House will permit me, to make a report from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to that.

Mr. COX. What is the previous question acting on?

The SPEAKER. On the amendments of the Senate to the internal revenue bill.

Mr. DAWES. I merely desire to make a report from the Committee of Elections that it may be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that all?

Mr. DAWES. That is all I desire.

Mr. DUMONT. I object.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 122,) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes. The pending question is upon a motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider.

The Chair will state the effect of the motion. The House by a vote of 106 to 41 non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate imposing additional duties on a sliding scale upon whisky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] moved to reconsider the vote by which the House non-concurred in that amendment, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and the yeas and nays were ordered on that motion. The Clerk will now report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 1, line ten, after the word "gallon," insert the following:

And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of July next; and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ailey, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Beaman, Bliss, Boutwell, Brundage, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Dawson, Denning, Dennison, Dixon, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fiuck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jencks, Julian, Kaibfeisch, Kasson, Francis W. Morris, Morrison, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Scott, Spalding, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, English, Fenton, Halt, Hooper, Kelley, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Meludoe, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Webster, and Wilder—44.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. NOBLE stated that he had paired with Mr. ASHLEY, who was sick at his room.

Mr. BAXTER stated that Mr. MORRILL was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, stated that Mr. ASHLEY was confined to his room by sickness, but if he had been present he would have voted against the Senate amendment.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon the sixth amendment of the Senate, which is as follows:

Page 4, line six, after the word "recovered," insert "and applied."

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

In line seven of the same section, after the word "and," insert "also that."

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

Page 4, line fourteen, after the words "provided, however," strike out all down to the end of the section, as follows:

That where, owing to the perishable nature of the property seized, expense of storage, or other circumstances, the value whereof may be diminished by delay of sale, the owner thereof may, if he so choose, apply to the assessor of the district, who shall, if he deem it expedient that the property so seized should be sold, appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and the owner may give bond or bonds in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the assessor shall adjudge good and sufficient, which shall be by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be held and collected, or any part thereof, or surrendered in accordance with the final judgment, order, or decree of the court having jurisdiction of the case; or, if the owner shall not apply as aforesaid, the assessor, upon the application of the marshal of the said district in whose custody and control said spirits or other articles seized as aforesaid may be, shall appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and shall issue and return to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same, and the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the same, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting therefrom the costs of seizure and sale, shall be paid into the court having jurisdiction of the case, and paid out as the said court shall on final judgment order or decree.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

That when the property so seized may be liable to peril, or become greatly reduced in value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, the owner thereof, or the marshal of the district, may apply to the assessor of the district to examine said property. And if, in the opinion of said assessor, it shall be necessary that the said property should be sold to prevent such waste or expense, he shall appraise the same; and the owner thereupon shall have said property returned to him upon giving bond, in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the said appraiser shall deem good and sufficient, to abide the final order, decree, or judgment of the court having cognizance of the case, and to pay the amount of said appraised value to the marshal, or otherwise, as he may be ordered and directed by the court, which bond shall be filed by said appraiser with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But if said owner shall neglect or refuse to give said bond, the appraiser shall issue to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same. And the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the said property, at public auction, in the same manner as goods may be sold on final execution in said district. And the proceeds of the sale, after deducting the reasonable costs of the seizure and sale, shall be paid to the court aforesaid, to abide its final order, decree, or judgment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

In the phrase "and to be placed," strike out the word "to."

The amendment was concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

In the phrase "or which provides for the manufacture," &c., strike out the letter "s" in "provides."

The amendment was concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

Add the following:
Or which provide for an allowance or drawback on cordials and other liquors when exported.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twelfth amendment:

Strike out the following:

Provided, That on all cotton on which the duty of a half cent has been paid, the additional duty of one and a half cent shall be levied and collected: And provided further, That all provisions of law whereby cotton in the hands of manufacturers of cotton fabrics on October 1, 1862, and prior thereto, is exempted from taxation, are hereby repealed, and the same shall be subject to the rate of taxation imposed by this bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirteenth amendment:

In section five strike out the words "which shall be dated and contain a description, including the weight and other marks of the bales or packages, and a statement of the fact that the duty has been paid;" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Stating therein the amount and payment of the duty, the time and place of payment, the weight and marks upon the bales and packages, so that the same may be fully identified.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourteenth amendment:

In section seven, after the word "countries," insert the words "previous to the 1st day of July next;" so that it will read:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on spirits distilled from grain or other materials, whether of American or foreign production, imported from foreign countries previous to the 1st day of July next, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifteenth amendment:

After the foregoing insert:

And on all such spirits imported from foreign countries, on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, a duty of fifty cents on each and every gallon; and on all such spirits imported from foreign countries, on and after the 1st day of January next, sixty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call attention to the fact, and ask the Speaker if it is not so, that this amendment depends upon that other amendment of the Senate which we have rejected.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate, and the Chair cannot answer it. It is a matter for the House.

Mr. KASSON. It is a fact, and I wish to call the attention of the House to it.

The question being on the fifteenth amendment, Mr. KASSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WEBSTER and THAYER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 60.

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RADFORD and HOOPER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-one, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Broomall, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Fenton, Finck, Hall, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hutchins, Kelley, King, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, and Wilder—57.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alvey, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Davies, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Herrick, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Kiapp, Law, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Odell, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Ross, Spalding, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Upson, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—76.

So the fifteenth amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NOBLE stated that his colleague, Mr. ASHLEY, was sick and confined to his room, and had requested him to procure a pair. His colleague was opposed to all the amendments of the Senate, but he did not know how he would have voted on this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the fifteenth amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Sixteenth amendment:

Strike out the following from the seventh section:

And that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Seventeenth amendment:

Strike out section nine, as follows:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the assessors and assistant assessors appointed as provided in the act to which this act is an amendment, to assess the additional duties levied by this act upon all spirits and cotton on which the duty prescribed in said act shall have been paid or assessed at the time when this act takes effect; and the lists thereof shall be returned to the several collectors, and the collections made in the same manner as in the case of monthly returns of manufactures. And the duties so assessed shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all the real and personal estate of the owner of such spirits or cotton, to be enforced in the same manner as is provided in the case of the manufacturers who neglect or refuse to pay the duties provided by the act to which this is in addition: Provided, That the additional duty of one and one half cent per pound shall be levied upon cotton sold by the United States previous to the passage of this act, and on which a duty of one half of one cent per pound has been paid; and upon all cotton so sold on which no duty has been paid a duty of two cents per pound shall be assessed and collected.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved March 2, 1833, now in force, shall be taken and deemed as extending to and embracing all laws for the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes which have been or may be hereafter enacted; and all persons duly authorized to assess, receive, or collect such duties or taxes under such laws are hereby declared to be, and to have been, "revenue officers" within the true intent and meaning of the said act, and entitled to all the exemptions, immunities, benefits, rights, and privileges therein enumerated and conferred.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the sixth amendment of the Senate, inserting in section two the words "and applied," so as to make the clause read:

And any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such spirits or other articles, subject to duty as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered and applied as other penalties provided by the act heretofore mentioned.

Mr. KASSON. I ask whether that is the amendment which the House agreed to on my motion?

Mr. HOLMAN. The House refused to agree to that in the original bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] suggested the insertion of these words.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The amendment moved by the gentleman from Iowa was quite a different one from this, and with the consent of the House I will state what it was.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa had this effect, that informers were entitled to one half of the penalty. The law as it now stands limits the moiety to those persons who inform officially, deputy collectors, &c. If they furnish information of the violation of the law they are to receive one half. The effect of this amendment is to limit the moiety to official persons.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that understanding I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The question then being on the remaining motion, that the House ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses, proposed before the seconding of the previous question, it was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, as such committee on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed an act (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying papers, relative to the claim on this Government of the owners of the French ship La Manche, and recommend an appropriation for the satisfaction of the claim, pursuant to the award of the arbitrators.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the message be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolutions; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That John S. Sleeper is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district in Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Alexander H. Rice is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the third congressional district in Massachusetts.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of House bill No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, reported from the select committee on the subject, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this measure—only to have it referred for discussion. The discussion of its details will be ably conducted by the minority of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KALBFLEISCH] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KNAPP]. I shall only call attention to its general features. The member who introduced it [Mr. ELIOT] commended it to this side for its humanity. He recalled to our minds the fact that we opposed the confiscation bill for its inhumanity. He hoped that humane considerations would prevail as to this bill. I wish that he had set a better example, by his voice and vote upon the other measure. This bill is founded in part on the confiscation system. If that were inhuman, then this is its aggravation. The former takes the lands which are abandoned by loyal or disloyal whites, under the pressure of war; while the present bill turns these abandoned lands over to the blacks. But motives of humanity, however pure, are not the motives that should prompt legislation altogether.

I only refer to the confiscation part of the measure to show how comprehensive and all-reaching is this scheme. The industrious gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] states that he is the author of the confiscation bill, of which this bill is the sequel.

Mr. ELIOT. I did not say that I was the author of the confiscation bill. I said that I reported it from the select committee that had that matter in charge.

Mr. COX. I misapprehended the tenor of the gentleman's remarks. I have no doubt that he had a good deal to do with getting it up. The gentleman's modesty will not permit him to claim the credit of it. I rather think that all of these measures spring from the fertile brain of the Solicitor of the Treasury, (Mr. Whiting.) He is the reservoir of all the Republican heresy and legislation proposed in this House; though he is often confounded, I think, with divine Providence, to whom gentlemen are erroneously in the habit of attributing these abolition measures.

But to return to the member from Massachusetts. The effect of former legislation has been, in his opinion, to bring under the control of the Government large multitudes of freedmen who "had ceased to be slaves, but had not learned how to be free." To care for these multitudes he presents this bill, which, if not crude and undigested, yet is sweeping and revolutionary. It begins a policy for our Federal Government of limited and express powers, so latitudinarian that the whole system of our Government is changed. If the acts of confiscation and the proclamations, on which this measure is founded, be usurpations, how can we who have denounced them favor a measure like this?

According to Mr. Whiting, this system, to be complete, must include in its provisions all the abandoned lands, all lands forfeited for taxes, all confiscated lands, all derelict personalty, all colored men free before the war in rebellious districts, and all fugitives thereto from loyal States, all legal proceedings of confiscation, all migrations of blacks to and from rebel States, all laws compensating masters for slaves, and all other matters relating to the colored people, whether bond or free.

This is a new system introduced into our Government. It opens a vast opportunity for greed, tyranny, corruption, and abuse. It may be inaugurated in the name of humanity; but I doubt, sir, if any Government, much less our Federal Government of limited and delegated powers, will ever succeed in the philanthropic line of business, such as is contemplated by this bill.

The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals to us to forget the past—not to inquire how these poor people have become free, whether by law or by usurpation, but to look the great fact in the face "that three million slaves have become and are becoming free."

Before I come to that great fact let me first look to the Constitution. My oath to that is the highest humanity. By preserving the Constitution amidst the rack of war, in any vital part, we are saving for a better time something of those liberties, State and personal, which have given so much happiness for over seventy years to so many millions; and which, under a favorable Administration, might again restore contentment to our afflicted people. Hence the highest humanity is in building strong the ramparts of constitutional restraint against such radical usurpations as is proposed to be inaugurated by measures kindred to this before the House.

If the gentleman can show us warrant in the Constitution to establish this eleemosynary system for the blacks, and for making the Government of the United States a grand plantation speculator and overseer, and the Treasury a fund for the helpless negro, I will then consider the charitable light in which he has commended his bill to our sympathies. It does not follow that because (as General Butler once said) there were as many poor in proportion to the people in the poor-houses of Massachusetts who were killed outright by bad treatment as were killed at the battle of Solferino in proportion to those engaged, that we are to interfere by Federal legislation for the victims of Massachusetts inhumanity.

I would love to do something for the poor blacks who have been thrown houseless, clothless, foodless, medicineless, and friendless on the cold world by the improvident and barbarous philanthropy now in vogue; but when my constituents ask me for my warrant thus to tax them, I wish to be able to point it out. If you can so frame your bill as to draw no money from the Treasury, and make your scheme self-supporting; or if you can so perfect the system as to connect it legally with the military without degrading the Army, and still discipline and care for the unfortunate blacks, male and female, old and young, strong and weak, then we may consider its propriety and legality with a view to aid its passage.

We cannot and do not desire to ignore the fact that incalculable misery has been and will be the fate of the freed negroes; but it is another and a difficult problem to reconcile the aid they require from the benevolent with our oaths and well-matured judgments as to the province of the Federal Government over matters like this. The gentleman refers us for the constitutionality of this measure to the war power, the same power by which he justifies the emancipation proclamation and similar measures. We upon this side are thoroughly convinced of the utter sophistry of such reasoning. If the proclamation be unconstitutional, how can this or any measure based on it be valid? The gentleman says, "If the President had the power to free the slave, does it not imply the power to take care of him when freed?" Yes, no doubt. If he had any power under the war power he has all power. He is so utterly irresponsible that even Congress cannot share his monarchical despotism. Under the war power he is a tyrant without a clinch on his revolutions. He can spin in any orbit he likes, as far and as long as he pleases.

He refers us also to that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to declare war and to make rules concerning captures on land." This latter argument squares with the theory of this war announced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for the authority of Congress to declare war is of course only meant as against foreign nations, and Congress can make all rules concerning captures in such a war. But unless the gentlemen on the other side are ready to acknowledge the independence of the South, and recognize them as a separate nation of belligerents, then his argument proves nothing in behalf of this bill, except that he is a theoretical secessionist. The constitutional argument in favor of this bill is one that this side of the House cannot recognize, unless we are prepared to unsay and undo all that we have said and done to protect the Constitution since the abolition measures began to take the form of law.

"But," it is urged, "something must be done for the poor blacks. They are perishing by thousands. We must look the great fact of anti-slavery and its millions of enfranchised victims in the face and legislate for their relief." Such is the appeal to our kindlier natures. Something should be done. The humanity which so long pitied the plumage should not forget the dying bird. But what can be done without violating the Constitution of the United States, or without intrenching upon a domain never granted by the States or the people in their written charter of powers? What can be done? Oh! ye, honey-tongued humanitarians of New England, with your coffers filled from the rough hand of western toil, the beaded sweat of whose industry by the subtle alchemy of your inventive genius is transmuted into the jewels of your parvenu and shoddy splendor, with your dividends rising higher and higher like waves under this storm of war; I would beseech you to go into the camps of the contrabands, as the gentleman described them, who are starving and pining for their old homes, and lift them out of the mire into which your improvident and premature schemes have dragged them, pour the oil of healing into their wounds, and save a few of them at least from the doom of extermination. Here is a fitting and legal opportunity for the exercise of a gracious humanity. I rejoice to know that many good men, even from New England, have embraced it.

But the gentleman urges this legislation, because if it be not passed, the President's proclamation will be made "a living lie." He thinks that "neither the considerate judgment of mankind nor the gracious favor of God can be invoked upon the President's act of freedom unless the law shall protect the freedom which the sword has declared." Not merely has the President's proclamation been made a living lie, but the thousands of corpses daily hurried out of the contraband hovel and tents along the Mississippi prove it to have been a deadly lie. Neither the judgment of man nor the favor of God can be invoked without mockery upon a fanatical project so fraught with misery to the weak and wholesale slaughter to its deluded victims!

But we are warned to look the great fact in the face that millions unfit for freedom are yet to become free. I know, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot change the fact by closing our eyes. It is true. The revolution rolls on. No effort on the part of the Democracy to achieve a peace through conciliation will now be listened to. The spirit of those in power is the spirit of extermination. The war with its revolutions goes on, and slavery as a political if not as a social institution may fall under its crushing car. It may be that all of the four million slaves will be thrown, like the one hundred thousand already freed, upon the frigid charities of the world. But, sir, if slavery be doomed, so, alas! is the slave. No scheme like this bill can save him. The Indian reserves, treaties, bounties, and agencies did not and does not save the red man. No Government farming system, no charitable black scheme, can wash out the color of the negro, change his inferior nature, or save him from his inevitable fate. The irrepressible conflict is not between slavery and freedom, but between black and white; and, as De Tocqueville prophesied, the black will perish.

Do gentlemen on the other side rely upon the new system, called by the transcendental abolitionists "Miscegenation," to save the black? This is but another name for amalgamation; but it will not save the negro. True, Wendell Phillips says it is "God's own method of crushing out the hatred of race, and of civilizing and elevating the world," and Theodore Tilton, the editor of the Independent, (a paper publishing the laws of the United States by authority,) holds that hereafter the "negro will lose his typical blackness and be found clad in white men's skins." But, sir, no system so repugnant to the nature of our race—and to organize which doubtless the next Congress of Progressives, and perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts, will practically provide—can save the negro.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no doubt that my friend understands all about it.

Mr. COX. I understand all about it, for I have the doctrines laid down in circulars, pamphlets, and books published by your anti-slavery people. But it was not my intention to discuss it now and upon this bill.

Mr. PRICE. If all the blacks are crushed out, how is amalgamation to ruin the country?

Mr. COX. They will all run, according to the new gospel of abolition, into the white people, on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELIOT. Is that what the gentleman is afraid of?

Mr. COX. No, sir; for I do not believe that the doctrine of miscegenation, or the amalgamation of the white and black, now strenuously urged by the abolition leaders, will save the negro. It will destroy him utterly. The physiologist will tell the gentleman that the mulatto does not live; he does not recreate his kind; he is a monster.

Such hybrid races, by a law of Providence, scarcely survive beyond one generation. I promise the gentleman at some future and appropriate time, when better prepared to develop that idea of miscegenation as now heralded by the abolitionists, who are in the van of the Republican movement—

Mr. ELIOT. I hope that the gentleman will go into it.

Mr. COX. If such be the desire of the gentleman I will attempt it, though reluctantly; for my materials, like the doctrine, are a little "mixed."

Mr. GRINNELL rose.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I want none of his impertinences in my speech. The other day when I was speaking he interrupted me with them without my consent. I do not recognize him as the member to whom I owe the courtesy of my attention.

But since I am challenged to exhibit this doctrine of the abolitionists—called after some Greek words—miscegenation—to minge and generate—I call your attention first to a circular I hold in my hand. It was circulated at the Cooper Institute the other night, when a female who, in the presence of the President, Vice President, and you, Mr. Speaker, and your associates in this Hall, made the same saucy speech for abolition which she addressed to the people of New York. It begins with the following significant quotation from Shakspeare:

"The elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up,
And say to all the world, This was a man!"
[Laughter.]

"Miscegenation: the Theory of the Blending of the Races, applied to the American White Man and Negro. Among the subjects treated of are

- "1. The Mixture of Caucasian and African Blood Essential to American Progress." [Laughter.]
- "2. How the American may become Comely." [Laughter.]
- "3. The Type Man a Miscegen—The Sphinx Riddle Solved."
- "4. The Irish and Negro first to Commingle." [Laughter.]
- "5. Heart Histories of the Daughters of the South."
- "6. Miscegenetic Ideal of Beauty in Women."
- "7. The Future—No White—No Black."

If gentlemen doubt the authenticity of this new movement let them go to the office of publication, 113 Nassau street, New York, and purchase. The movement is an advance upon the doctrine of the gentlemen opposite, but they will soon work up to it. The more philosophical and apostolic of the abolition fraternity have fully decided upon the adoption of this amalgamation platform. I am informed that the doctrines are already indorsed by such lights as Parker Pillsbury, Lucretia Mott, Albert Brisbane, William Wells Brown, Dr. McCune Smith, (half and half—miscegen,) Angelina Grimke, Theodore D. Weld and wife, and others.

But these are inferior lights compared with others I shall quote. When I name Theodore Tilton, an editor of the Government paper in Brooklyn called the Independent; when I recall the fact that the polished apostle of abolition, Wendell Phillips, whose golden-lipped eloquence can make miscegenation as attractive to the ears as it is to the other senses; when I quote from the New York Tribune, the center and circumference of the abolition movement, and Mrs. Stowe, whose writings have almost redeemed by their genius the hate and discord which they aided to create; when I shall have done all this, I am sure the Progressives on the other side will begin to prick up their ears and study the new science of miscegenation with a view to its practical realization by a bureau. [Laughter.]

First hear the testimony of Wendell Phillips. He says:

"Now I am going to say something that I know will make the New York Herald use its small capitals and notes of admiration, and yet no well-informed man this side of China but believes it in the very core of his heart. That is, 'amalgamation'—a word that the northern apologist for slavery has always used so glibly, but which you never heard from a southerner. Amalgamation! Remember this, the youngest of you: that on the 4th day of July, 1863, you heard a man say, that in the light of all history, in virtue of every page he ever read, he was an amalgamationist to the utmost extent. I have no hope for the future, as this country has no past, and Europe has no past but in that sublime mingling of races which is God's own method of civilizing and elevating the world. God, by the events of his providence, is crushing out the hatred of race which has crippled this country until to-day."

I put it to gentlemen on the other side, Are you responsible for him? Ah! you received him, how ardently in this city and Capitol last year!

Mr. ELIOT. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COX. Wendell Phillips. The Senate doors flew open for him; the Vice President of the United States welcomed him; Senators flocked around him; Representatives cheered his disunion utterances at the Smithsonian; and you will follow him wherever he leads. He is a practical amalgamationist, and he is leading and will lead you up to the platform on which you will finally stand. You may seem coy and reluctant now, but so you were about the political equality of the negro a year ago; so you were about abolishing slavery in the States two years ago. Now you are in the millennial glory of abolition. So it will be hereafter with amalgamation!

Here is what Theodore Tilton, editor of the Independent, says in the circular to which I have referred:

"Have you not seen with your own eyes—no man can have escaped it—that the black race in this country is losing its typical blackness? The Indian is dying out; the negro is only changing color! Men who, by and by, shall ask for the Indians, will be pointed to their graves: 'There lie their ashes.' Men who, by and by, shall ask for the negroes, will be told, 'There they go, clad in white men's skins.' A hundred years ago a mulatto was a curiosity; now the mulattoes are half a million. You can yourself predict the future!"

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will permit me to say that surely all this was under a state of slavery.

Mr. COX. I will show the gentleman directly that his friends and leaders propose to continue it in a state of freedom. It will be the freest kind of license.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will allow me to suggest whether the difficulty he labors under is not that the Democratic party is afraid the Republicans will get ahead of them.

Mr. COX. I am not afraid of anything of the kind while white people remain upon which we can center our affections and philanthropy. You can take the whole monopoly of "miscegenation." We abhor and detest it. The circular referred to has other indorsements, which I quote before I reach that Warwick of Republicanism, Horace Greeley. The Anti-Slavery Standard of January 30 says:

"This pamphlet comes directly and fearlessly to the advocacy of an idea of which the American people are more afraid than any other. Assuredly God's laws will fulfill and vindicate themselves. It is in the highest degree improbable that He has placed a natural repugnance between any two families of His children. If He has done so, that decree will execute itself, and these two will never seek intimate companionship together. If, on the contrary, He has made no such barrier, no such one is useful or desirable, and every attempt to restrain these parties from exercising their natural choice is in contravention of His will, and is an unjust exercise of power. The future must decide how far black and white are disposed to seek each other in marriage. The probability is that there will be a progressive intermingling, and that the nation will be benefited by it."

I hold in my hand the Anglo-African, of January 23, which discusses this subject from the purely African stand-point:

"The author of the pamphlet before us advances beyond these lights of the days gone by. What they deemed a remote and undesirable probability he regards as a present and pressing necessity; what they deemed to be an evil to be legislated against he regards as a blessing which should be hastened by all the legislative and political organizations in the land! The word, nay the deed, miscegenation, the same in substance with the word amalgamation, the terror of our abolition friends twenty years ago, and of many of them to-day—miscegenation which means intermarriages between whites and blacks—'miscegenation,' which means the absolute practical brotherhood and social intermingling of blacks and whites, he would have inscribed on the banner of the Republican party, and held up as the watchword of the next presidential platform!"

"We take a deep interest in the doctrine shadowed forth, that to improve a given race of men. It is too late to begin with infant and Sunday schooling: at birth they have the bent of their parents, which we may slightly alter, but cannot radically change. The education and improvement should begin with the marriage of parties who, instead of strong resemblances, should have contrasts which are complementary each of the other. It is disgraceful to our modern civilization that we have societies for improving the breed of sheep, horses, and pigs, while the human race is left to grow up without scientific culture."

The editor of the Anglo-African confesses that he is a little staggered in his theories by what he calls the evident deterioration of the mixed bloods of Central America, but he finds the solution of the difficulty in the fact that the races there mixed, Indian and Spanish, are not complementary of each other. This, to my observation, Mr. Speaker, is as absurd as it is untrue. But I am not now arguing the reasonableness of this doctrine of mixed races. I only propose to show what it is, and whither it is tending.

The New York Tribune, the great organ of the dominant party, is not so frank as the Anglo-African, but its exposition of "miscegenation" is one of the signs which point to the Republican solution of our African troubles by the amalgamation of the races. In indorsing the doctrine of this pamphlet, Mr. Greeley holds that—

"No statesman in his senses cares to put morsels of euticle under a microscope before he determines upon the prudence of a particular policy. Diversity of races is the condition precedent in America, and their assimilation is the problem. High skulls, broad skulls, long skulls, black hair, red hair, yellow hair, straight jaws or prominent jaws, white skins, black skins, copper skins, or olive skins, Caucasians, Ethiopians, Mongolians, Americans, or Malays, with oval pelvis, round pelvis, square pelvis, or oblong pelvis, we have or may have them all in our population; and our business is to accommodate all by subjecting merely material differences to the ameliorating influence of an honest and unlimited recognition of one common nature."

To "assimilate these various races" is the problem which Mr. Greeley approaches. We cannot but admire the delicate phraseology by which his approaches are couched. Not so the pamphlet to which I referred. It is bold and outspoken. It advocates a preference of the black over the white as partners. The following are the points inculcated by its author:

- "1. Since the whole human race is of one family, there should be, in a republic, no distinction in political or social rights on account of color, race, or nativity."
- "2. The doctrine of human brotherhood implies the right of white and black to intermarry."
- "3. The solution of the negro problem will not be reached in this country until public opinion sanctions a union of the two races."
- "4. As the negro is here and cannot be driven out there should be no impediment to the absorption of one race in the other."
- "5. Legitimate unions between whites and blacks could not possibly have any worse effect than the illegitimate unions which have been going on more than a century at the South."
- "6. The mingling of diverse races is proved by all history to have been a positive benefit to the progeny."
- "7. The southern rebellion is caused less by slavery than by the base prejudice resulting from distinction of color; and perfect peace can come only by a cessation of that distinction through an absorption of the black race by the white."
- "8. It is the duty of anti-slavery men everywhere to advocate the mingling of the two races."
- "9. The next presidential election should secure to the blacks all their social and political rights; and the progressive party should not flinch from conclusions fairly deducible from their own principles."
- "10. In the millennial future the highest type of manhood will not be white or black, but brown; and the union of black with white in marriage will help the human family the sooner to realize its great destiny."

The author finds an emblem of his success in the blending of many to make the one new race, in the crowning of the dome above this Capitol with the bronze statue of Liberty! It is neither black nor white, but the intermediate miscegen, typifying the exquisite composite race which is to arise out of this war for abolition, and whose destiny it is to rule the continent! Well might the correspondent of the New York Tribune, in describing the lifting of the uncouth masses, and bolting them together joint by joint, till they blended into the majestic "Freedom" which lifts her head in the blue sky above us, regard the scene as prophetic of the time when the reconstructed symbol of freedom in America shall be a colored goddess of liberty! But to the pamphlet itself. Here we have it, Mr. Speaker. This new evangel for the redemption of the black and white, upon its introductory page begins as follows:

"The word is spoken at last. It is miscegenation—the blending of the various races of men—the practical recognition of the brotherhood of all the children of the common Father." [Laughter.]

Just what our miscegenetic Chaplain prays for here almost every morning; and you all voted for him, even some of my friends from the border States. The "introduction" proceeds:

"While the sublime inspirations of Christianity have taught this doctrine, Christians so-called have ignored it in denying social equality to the colored man; while democracy is founded upon the idea that all men are equal, Democrats have shrunk from the logic of their own creed, and refused to fraternize with the people of all nations; while science has demonstrated that the intermarriage of diverse races is indispensable to a progressive humanity, its votaries, in this country at least, have never had the courage to apply that rule to the relations of the white and colored races. But Christianity, democracy, and science, are stronger than the timidity, prejudice, and pride of short-sighted men; and they teach that a people, to become great, must become composite. This involves what is vulgarly known as amalgamation." [Laughter.] "and those who dread that name, and the thought and fact it implies, are warned against reading these pages."

There are some remarkable things thrown out in this pamphlet, which should be examined by gentlemen upon the other side. The author discusses the effect of temperature on color. Quoting from a German naturalist, he holds—

"That the true skin is perfectly white; that over it is placed another membrane, called the reticular tissue, and that this is the membrane that is black; and, finally, that it is covered by a third membrane, the scarf skin, which has been compared to a fine varnish lightly extended over the colored membrane, and designed to protect it. Examine also this piece of skin, belonging to a very fair person. You perceive over the true white skin a membrane of a slightly brownish tint, and over that, again, but quite distinct from it, a transparent membrane. In other words, it clearly appears that the whites and the copper-colored have a colored membrane which is placed under the scarf skin and immediately above the true skin, just as it is in the negro. The infant negroes are born white, or rather reddish, like those of other people." [Laughter.] "but in two or three days the color begins to change; they speedily become copper-colored." [Laughter.] "and by the seventh or eighth day, though never exposed to the sun, they appear quite black." [Laughter.] "He mentions that it is known that negroes, in some rare instances, are born quite white or are true Albinos; sometimes, after being black for many years, they become piebald, or wholly white, without their general health suffering under the change. He also mentions another metamorphosis, which would not be agreeable to the prejudices of many among us; it is that of the white becoming piebald with black as deep as ebony."

That is an argument to show that we all, black and white, start off in the race of life nearly of the same color, and that we ought to come to it again, by the processes of—miscegenation!

The author, in his second chapter, devotes many pages to considering the superiority of mixed races. Without combating his facts or deductions, let me quote this grand conclusion:

"Whatever of power and vitality there is in the American race is derived, not from its Anglo-Saxon progenitors, but from all the different nationalities which go to make up this people. All that is needed to make us the finest race on earth is to ingraft upon our stock the negro element which Providence has placed by our side on this continent." [Laughter.] "Of all the rich treasures of blood vouchsafed to us, that of the negro is the most precious." [Laughter.] "because it is the most unlike any other that enters into the composition of our national life." [Laughter.]

Mr. WASIBURNE, of Illinois. I wish my friend from Ohio to read an extract from a book which he himself wrote.

Mr. COX. My friend ought not to be so sensitive. These developments will not hurt him. He does not belong to the miscegenists yet; and if he will stand by General Grant and the white constitution—physical and political—he will not "mix" himself in this matter. I again quote:

"It is clear that no race can long endure without a commingling of its blood with that of other races. The condition of all human progress is miscegenation." [Laughter.] "The Anglo-Saxon should learn this in time for his own salvation. If we will not heed the demands of justice, let us at least respect the law of self-preservation. Providence has kindly placed on the American soil, for his own wise purposes, four million colored people. They are our brothers, our sisters." [Laughter.] "By mingling with them we become powerful, prosperous, and progressive; by refusing to do so we become feeble, unhealthy, narrow-minded, unfit for the nobler offices of freedom, and certain of early decay." [Laughter.]

I call the special attention of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ELLIOT] to these points, with a view to their incorporation in his bureau for freedmen and freedwomen. All your efforts will be vain, and you will not be able to maintain a healthy vitality, if you do not mix your whites very freely with your black beneficiaries.

The writer gives us his theory of the war. Although the war has not quite reached the miscegenetic point yet, it progresses visibly. After showing how other wars have blended the various bloods of the world, he says:

"It will be our noble prerogative to set the example of this rich blending of blood. It is idle to maintain that this present war is not a war for the negro. It is a war for the negro. Not simply for his personal rights or his physical freedom; it is a war, if you please, of amalgamation, so called—a war looking, as its final fruit, to the blending of the white and black. All attempts to end it without a recognition of the political, civil, and social rights of the negro will only lead to still bloodier battles in the future. Let us be wise and look to the end. Let the war go on until every black man and every black woman is free. Let it go on until the pride of caste is done away. Let it go on until church, and state, and society recognize not only the propriety but the necessity of the fusion of the white and black;" [Laughter.] "In short, until the great truth shall be declared in our public documents and announced in the messages of our Presidents, that it is desirable the white man should marry the black woman and the white woman the black man—that the race should become melaleuketic before it becomes miscegenetic." [Great laughter.]

This is the language of scientific progress, soon to become familiar to the gentlemen on the other side. The author proceeds:

"The next step will be the opening of California to the teeming millions of eastern Asia. The patience, the industry, the ingenuity, the organizing power, the skill in the mechanic arts which characterize the Japanese and Chinese must be transplanted to our soil, not merely by the immigration of the inhabitants of those nations, but by their incorporation with the composite race which will hereafter rule this continent.

"It must be remembered that the Indians whom we have displaced were copper-colored; and no other complexion, physiologists affirm, can exist permanently in America. The white race which settled in New England will be unable to maintain its vitality as a blonde people. The darker shades of color live and thrive, and the consumption so prevalent in our eastern States is mainly confined to the yellow-haired and thin-blooded blondes."

What a sad picture this for our New England friends! Oh, ye yellow-haired and thin-blooded Yankees! Mingle! mingle! mingle while ye may! It is the sure cure for your asthmas and consumptions.

Still speaking of these thin-blooded New Englanders, he says:

"They need the intermingling of the rich tropic temperament of the negro to give warmth and fullness to their natures." [Laughter.] "They feel the yearning, and do not know how to interpret it." [Laughter.] "The physician tells them they must travel to a warmer climate. They recognize in this a glimpse of the want they feel, though they are hopeless of its efficacy to fully restore the lost vitality. Still they feel the nameless longing.

"Yet waft me from the harbor mouth,
Wild wind! I seek a warmer sky,
And I will see before I die
The palms and temples of the South."

"It is only by the infusion into their very system of the vital forces of a tropic race that they may regain health and strength. We must accept the facts of nature. We must become a yellow-skinned, black-haired people—in fine, we must become miscegens if we would attain the fullest results of civilization." [Laughter.]

This enthusiastic theorist then shows that all religions are derived from the dark races. He calls to us from the tombs of Egypt, and solves the Sphinx riddle of our national destiny. That solution is this: that "if we would fill our proper places in nature we must mingle our blood with all the children of the common Father of humanity." Thus and thus only can we hope for redemption by a pure religion. The cold skepticism of the Caucasian will then be expunged in the more genial faith which miscegenation will produce. Hear him:

"May we not hope that in the happier hereafter of this continent, when the Mongolian from China and Japan, and the negro from his own Africa, shall have bled their more emotional natures with ours, that here may be witnessed at once the most perfect religion as well as the most perfect type of mankind the world has yet seen? Let us then embrace our black brother;" [laughter:] "let us give him the intellect, the energy, the nervous endurance of the cold North which he needs, and let us take from him his emotional power, his love of the spiritual, his delight in the wonders which we understand only through faith. In the beautiful words of Emerson:

"He has the avenues to God
Hid from men of northern brain,
Far beholding, without cloud,
What these with slowest steps attain."

The writer then goes on to show what this miscegen will become physiologically. He will be the realization of the ideal, not of the white or of the black race, but the perfect ideal of the blended races! The artist is called in to adorn by the rarest touches of the facile pencil this production of advanced abolitionism:

"The ideal or type man of the future will blend in himself all that is passionate and emotional in the darker races, all that is imaginative and spiritual in the Asiatic races, and all that is intellectual and perceptive in the whiter races. He will also be composite as regards color. The purest miscegen will be brown, with reddish cheeks, curly and waving hair, dark eyes, and a fullness and suppleness of form not now dreamed of by any individual people."

"Adam, the progenitor of the race, as his very name signifies, was made of red earth; and, like the inhabitants of Syria and Mesopotamia, must have been of a tawny or yellow color. The extreme white and black are departures from the original type. The Saviour is represented very falsely in paintings as being light-haired and white-skinned, when, in truth, he must have been a man of very dark complexion, as were all the Palestine Jews. They were a tawny or yellow race. The fact has been noticed that the Amharic, the language of the Abyssinian, is remarkably analogous to the Hebrew, rendering it probable that the Jews were partly of Abyssinian or negro origin."

The writer makes the same mistake which others have made in confounding the Abyssinian with our Congo negro. They are utterly unlike in form and feature as well as in mind and character. The author's eloquence is better than his science; for with what enthusiasm does he close his appeal to the members of the abolition party:

"We urge upon white men and women no longer to glory in their color; it is no evidence of cultivation or of purity of blood. Adam and Christ, the type men of the world's great eras, were red or yellow, and to men of this color, above all others, must be communicated the higher inspirations which involve great spiritual truths, and which bring individuals of the human family into direct communion with supernatural agencies."

These theories, which seem so novel to us, have been a part of the gospel of abolition for years. The celebrated authoress of Uncle Tom's Cabin has made a pen-portrait of a miscegenetic woman and man in her novel called Drad. She makes them the central figures in her graphic scenes of southern life. Harry, the quadroon overseer, and Lisette, his wife, are described as of that "mixed blood which seems so peculiarly fitted to appreciate all the finer aspects of conventional life." Harry's power was such, owing to the constitution inherited from his father, tempered by the soft and genial temperament of the beautiful Eboc mulatress who was his mother, that, through fear or friendship, upon the plantation there was universal subordination to him. Lisette is described as a delicate, airy little creature, formed by a mixture of the African and French blood, producing one of those fanciful, exotic combinations that give the same impression of brilliancy and richness that one receives from tropical insects and flowers! Her eyes have the hazy, dreamy languor which is so characteristic of the mixed races.

With such sensuous portraiture as his original, the author I am considering finds all the characteristics of perfect ideal beauty in the—negro girl! He copies them with fidelity, if he does not surpass the original.

I call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side to this remarkable picture, for they will find its living counterpart only in the crazed skulls of their fanatic supporters:

"In what does beauty consist? In richness and brightness of color, and in gracefulness of curve and outline. What does the Anglo-Saxon, who assumes that his race monopolizes the beauty of the earth, look for in a lovely woman? Her cheeks must be rounded and have a tint of the sun, her lips must be pouting, her teeth white and regular, her eyes large and bright; her hair must curl about her head, or descend in crinkling waves; she must be merry, gay, full of poetry and sentiment, fond of song, childlike, and artless. But all these characteristics belong, in a somewhat exaggerated degree, to the negro girl. What color is beautiful in the human face? Is it the blank white? In paintings, the artist has never portrayed so perfect a woman to the fancy as when, choosing his subject from some other than the Caucasian race, he has been able to introduce the marvelous charm of the combination of colors in her face. Not alone to the white face, even when tinted with mantling blood, is the fascination of female loveliness imputed. The author may state—and the same experience can be witnessed to by thousands—that the most beautiful girl in form, feature, and every attribute of feminine loveliness he ever saw was a mulatto. By crossing and improvement of different varieties, the strawberry, or other garden fruit, is brought nearest to perfection, in sweetness, size, and fruitfulness. This was a ripe and complete woman, possessing the best elements of two sources of parentage. Her complexion was warm and dark, and golden with the heat of tropical suns, lips full and luscious, cheeks perfectly molded and tinged with deep crimson, hair curling, and

"Whose glossy black
To shame might bring
The plumage of the raven's wing."

This pamphleteer is a thorough philosopher. He holds that the slaveholders South are a superior race, owing to their intimate communication from birth to death with the colored race. Their emotional power, fervid oratory, and intensity of thought and will are attributed to this association. Their ability to cope with the North in battle is found to consist in the fact that the presence of Africans in their midst in large numbers infuses into the air a sort of barbaric malaria; a miasm of fierceness, which after long intercourse between the races comes to infect the white men and even the women also!

I would fail in my promise to elucidate this new creed of abolition, did I not call attention to the argument which the writer draws from the fact that contraries like each other and that the blonde inconspicuously falls in love with the black! From this principle of aesthetics or lust the author deduces his highest type of beauty. From this source of opposite yet mingling emotions he thinks that civilization will be enhanced and glorified!

I give his deductions as well for their novelty as for his felicity in choosing the names by which he illustrates them. Let me again quote:

"Such of our readers as have attended anti-slavery meetings will have observed the large proportion of blondes in the assemblage. This peculiarity is also noticeable in the leading speakers and agitators in the great anti-slavery party. Mr. Horace Greeley, of the New York Tribune, known for his devotion to the negro race, is as opposite as a man possibly can be to the people to whom he has shown his attachment by long and earnest labor for their welfare. In color, complexion, structure, mental habits, peculiarities of all kinds, they are as far apart as the poles. The same is true of Mr. Wendell Phillips. He, too, is the very opposite of the negro. His complexion is reddish and sanguine; his hair in younger days was light; he is, in short, one of the sharpest possible contrasts to the pure negro. Mr. Theodore Tilton, the eloquent young editor of the Independent, who has already achieved immortality by advocating enthusiastically the doctrine of miscegenation," [laughter:] "is a very pure specimen of the blonde, and when a young man was noted for his angelic type of feature." [laughter:] "we mean angelic after the type of Raphael, which is not the true angelic feature, because the perfect type of the future will be that of the blended races, with the sunny hues of the South tinged the colorless complexion of the icy North. But it is needless further to particularize. The sympathy Mr. Greeley, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. Tilton feel for the negro is the love which the blonde bears for the black; it is a love of race, a sympathy stronger to them than the love they bear to woman. It is founded upon natural law. We love our opposites."

"Nor is it alone true that the blonde love the black. The black also love their opposites. Said Frederick Douglass, a noble specimen of the melaleuketic American," [laughter:] "in one of his speeches: 'We love the white man, and will remain with him. We like him too well to leave him; but we must possess with him the rights of freemen.'

Our police courts give painful evidence that the passion of the colored race for the white is often so uncontrollable as to overcome the terror of the law. It has been so, too, upon the southern plantations. The only remedy for this is legitimate melancholic marriage." [Laughter.]

The revelations at Hilton Head and along the Carolina coast might have been added to the illustrations above to show the irrepressible affection between white women and black men and black women and white men. But on that—I forbear!

Sir, I cannot pursue this style of remark further. The contemplation of such disgusting theories is not pleasant. I have been challenged to go into it by my friend from Massachusetts. This is my apology. The gentlemen on the other side may be unconscious of the path they are traveling under the lead of these amalgamationists. But they must follow. They may protest, but we know that they will yield, for they have ever yielded to their extreme men. As this very writer himself truly says, (page 58):

"As the war has progressed, men's minds have been opened more and more to the true cause of our country's difficulties. Human nature is imperfect; it can ordinarily take in only half or quarter truths. It was a great step in the advance when the country willingly accepted the truth that all men should be free. But it might not have been seen by many that further along in the path of progress we should recognize the great doctrine of human brotherhood, and that human brotherhood comprehended not merely the personal freedom, but the acknowledgment of the political and social rights of the negro, and the provision for his entrance into those family relations which form the dearest and strongest ties that bind humanity together. Once place the races upon a footing of perfect equality, and these results will surely follow.

"Let it be understood, then, that equality before the law, for the negro, secures to him freedom, privilege to secure property and public position, and, above all, carries with it the ultimate fusion of the negro and white races. When this shall be accomplished by the inevitable influences of time, all the troubles that loom up now in the future of our country will have passed away. It is the true solution of our difficulties, and he is blind who does not see it. The President of the United States, fortunately for the country, has made a great advance in the right direction. His first thought in connection with the enfranchisement of the slaves was to send them from the country. He discovered, first, that this was physically impossible, and, second, that the labor alone which would be lost to America and the world would amount in value to more than the debts of all the nations of the earth. The negro is rooted on this continent; we cannot remove him; we must not hold him in bondage. The wisest course is to give him his rights, and let him alone; and by the certain influence of our institutions he will become a component element of the American man."

Gentlemen of the other side have here laid down for them the shining pathway that will lead them out of the troubles with which their ill-judged emancipation schemes have environed them. Whether they will follow it, time will show. Events will show whether the American people will not have a thorough and honest white man's disgust for all these African policies, culminating, as they must, in amalgamation, so as in time to reverse the wheel of revolution, and thus save both races—the one from continued slaughter, and the other from eventual and certain extermination.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my friend be good enough to yield to me a moment?

Mr. COX. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only desire to incorporate into the gentleman's speech an extract from his own book. I ask my friend to read it. I know he will do it.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will endeavor, then, to get the floor when he gets through.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has in his hand a book which I published in 1851—The Buckeye Abroad—and desires to read from it. I have had the extracts he would have read published for years in my district as political capital against me, but without much effect. They did not influence even the ignorant. I have heard these same extracts read here in this House by a former colleague, and I answered them thoroughly, as the gentleman knows. He will find my answer to it in the Congressional Globe of 1862.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COX. No, sir, I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not ask the gentleman to yield. I merely wish to say that I recollect the gentleman's speech. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois will come to order.

Mr. COX. I have quoted these extracts to show that there is a doctrine now being advertised and urged by the leading lights of the Abolition party, toward which the Republican party will and must advance. See how they have advanced for the last two or three years! They used to deny, whenever it was charged, that they favored black citizenship; yet now they are favoring free black suffrage in the District of Columbia, and will favor it wherever in the South they need it for their purposes. The Attorney General of the United States has declared the African to be an American citizen. The Secretary of State grants him a passport as such. The President of the United States calls him an American citizen of African descent. The Senate of the United States is discussing African equality in street cars. We have the negro at every moment and in every bill in Congress. All these things, in connection with the African policies of confiscation and emancipation in their various shapes for the past three years, culminating in this grand plunder scheme of a department for freedmen, ought to convince us that that party is moving steadily forward to perfect social equality of black and white, and can only end in this detestable doctrine of—miscegenation!

Gentlemen may deny that this is the tendency of their party. They used to deny that they favored the doctrine of the political equality of black and white, which was once charged upon them, and which they are now so boldly consummating. The truth will appear. After a year or two some member from New England will come here recognizing the great fact that four million blacks are mixing more or less, and ought to mix more with the whites of the country, and will advocate a bureau of another kind—a department for the hybrids who are cast upon the care of the Government by this system of miscegenation.

Mr. Speaker, since I have been upon the floor, the gentleman from Massachusetts more than hinted that the Democracy might desire to compete with his party in this new scheme of miscegenation. Not at all, sir. Our prejudices are strong, but they are in favor of our own color. We have, in times past, affiliated with the Democracy South, but I do not understand that the Democratic party North is responsible for what the Democratic party South did since or when they separated from us, or since and when they divided our party and helped you to divide the Union. The Democratic party of the North never was a pro-slavery party, as has been libelously charged. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, I know you laugh, gentlemen, at that; but your laugh is "like the crackling of thorns under a pot."

The Scripture tells you what kind of laughter that is. It would be unparliamentary to characterize it further. I repeat it, the Democracy North never was a pro-slavery party. I know the contrary has been reiterated by the crew who have floated on the summer current of northern prejudice, until many good people believe it. A grosser falsehood was never uttered. Even Horace Greeley is ashamed any more to repeat it. He stated the other day our position correctly, when he said that "northern Democracy is not really pro-slavery, but anti-intervention; maintaining, not that slavery is right, but that we of the free States should mind our own business and let alone other people's." Our platforms are but the repetition of this idea of non-interference. Beginning with 1840 and ending with 1860, we resolved—

"That Congress has no power, under the Constitution, to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States; and that such States are the sole and proper judges of everything pertaining to their own affairs, not prohibited by the Constitution; that all efforts by abolitionists or others made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences, and that all such efforts have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people, and endanger the stability and permanency of the Union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend to our political institutions."

The Democracy ever favored local sovereignty as to slavery and every other domestic matter. They would have extended that sovereignty, and not slavery, from the States to the Territories. On that question of extension, of non-intervention, the Democracy North and South unhappily divided. The consequences are upon us.

I accept events as they transpire. Not responsible for them, yet not unobservant of them, I call the attention of the House to the bold strides which have been made since we last met, by fraud and force, to crush out the institution of slavery. I need not point you to the black recruiting system in Maryland and Missouri. I need not rehearse the orders of generals and subordinates, all working to this end, regardless of the rights of property or local sovereignty. Slavery hangs precariously, by a hair, in Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Missouri, and Florida. Even in old Kentucky, where her loyal people cared less for it and more for their State right over it, anti-slavery is at work. Wherever in our lines slavery yet exists, it is comparatively free and altogether profitless. It works at its own will, and not at the will of the master. Outside of our lines—within the Gulf States—slaves once worth $2,000 are now only worth their $100 in gold; and this depreciation will go on if our armies continue to penetrate the South. If it thus go on, where will it end? In the grave of the slave! Read the accounts of mortality among the blacks, especially those in the military. Each camp is a hospital. The deserted families perish by their removal from their homes, by vice and starvation. We of this side have no power to stop it. The war keeps it going. For this condition of the negro let the Abolition party and its savage counterpart South answer to God and the country. To the horrors and calamities of the whites growing out of this war is to be added the miseries and destruction of the blacks; and this indictment of high crime will not be found against the northern Democracy, but against its revilers North, who divided our Union, and its enemies South, who divided our party.

In the forthcoming election for Chief Magistrate you will find the Democracy making no issue about slavery. If it is dying or dead, as you allege, you will find them striving their utmost to preserve what they can of local and personal liberty out of the chaos of this conflict. We have been the champions of local and State liberty, not because slavery was guaranteed by it. No, sir. We have not championed slavery. We never placed it in our northern constitutions. I would fain have seen slavery die, if die it must, by the unforced action of the States, as it has died in the now free States, and not by the rough usages of war, which destroys the slave with slavery; not by usurpations upon the rights of the States and the people, which destroy both freedom and slavery and slave, but by the sovereign intelligence of the people of the States, who alone are responsible for the existence of their own domestic institutions.

I am not insensible to the signs of the times. Judging by what we daily see here in this House, the border States, through the blandishments of power, the fear of ruin, the tyranny of the bayonet, and the corruption of greenbacks, are, I think, gradually being persuaded to yield before the genius of universal emancipation! The music of the old Union is hushed in the bugles of war. The northern Democracy, in struggling to preserve the institutions of those States, and in doing which they have been and are yet in sympathy with their only proper representatives, have done so from no love of slavery; but because, in the language of the Chicago platform, they would by preserving State institutions, "preserve the balance of power, on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depended."

When the party in power, by edict and bayonet, by sham election and juggling proclamation, drag down slavery, they drag down in the spirit of ruthless iconoclasm the very genius of our civil polity, local self-government. They strike constitutional liberty in striking at domestic slavery. Hence they must abolish habeas corpus when they stab the hated institution. They must invade bills of right when they invade State rights.

When next you meet us at the polls you shall answer for the perfection of our political fabric which you have marred, and the endurance of which you have imperiled. No more wrangling about pro-slavery or anti-slavery. The question shall be, the old order with Democracy to administer it, or continued revolution with destructives to guide it; the old Union with as much of local sovereignty as may be saved from the abrasion of war, or a new abolition and military unity of territory, with debt, tyranny, and fanaticism as its trinity.

Mr. COLE, of California, obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from California will yield to me a moment.

Mr. COLE, of California. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to make an excuse for the author of the pamphlet from which the gentleman from Ohio has read such copious extracts. I think that author has been corrupted by my friend from Ohio. I think he must have been reading a book which the gentleman from Ohio has written, which I now hold in my hand, and which I have read with great pleasure. The gentleman from Ohio said that he had heretofore answered this book in the House, and that I had heard his speech. I always liked to hear the speech he made to-day. [Laughter.] I have listened to it several times. [Laughter.] We shall not probably have the pleasure at next Congress of hearing my friend from Ohio rehearse this speech here, because I think, in the light of the recent elections in Ohio, and particularly in the district of the honorable gentleman, I can say to him in the language of Watts, and in the spirit of the utmost kindness,

"You living man, come view the ground
Where you must shortly lie."

I desire to show the House what the gentleman from Ohio has written in regard to the "African," in a book entitled A Buckeye Abroad; or Wanderings in Europe and in the Orient. By S. S. Cox. He is describing St. Peter's, and says: "In the mean time seraphic music from the Pope's select choir ravishes the ear, while the incense titillates the nose. Soon there arises in the chamber of theatrical glitter"—what?—"a plain unquestioned African! [laughter;] and he utters the sermon in facile Latinity, with graceful manner. His dark hands gestured harmoniously with the rotund periods, and his swart visage beamed with a high order of intelligence." [Laughter.] What was he? Let the gentleman from Ohio answer: "He was an Abyssinian. What a commentary was here upon our American prejudices! The head of the great Catholic church surrounded by the ripest scholars of the age, listening to the eloquence"—of whom?—"of the despised negro; and thereby illustrating to the world"—what?—"thereby illustrating to the world the common bond of brotherhood which binds the human race." [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House if it does not appear that the author of that pamphlet must have been corrupted by reading the work of my friend from Ohio.

But the gentleman goes on to say: "I confess that, at first, it seemed to me a sort of theatrical mummery, not being familiar with such admixtures of society." That was the first impression of my young and festive friend from Ohio as he wandered through the gilded corridors of St. Peter's. [Laughter.] "But," he says, "on reflection, I discerned in it the same influence which, during the dark ages, conferred such inestimable blessings on mankind. History records that from the time of the revival of letters the influence of the church of Rome had been generally favorable to science, to civilization, and to good government. Why?" Why, asks my friend from Ohio, is the church of Rome so favorable to science, to civilization, and to good government? Let the gentleman answer: "Because her system held then, as it holds now, all distinctions of caste as odious." [Great laughter.] "She regards no man, bond or free, white or black, as disqualified for the priesthood. This doctrine has, as Macaulay develops in his introductory chapters to his English history, mitigated many of the worst evils of society; for where race tyrannized over race, or baron over villain, Catholicism came between them and created an aristocracy altogether independent of race or feudalism, compelling even the hereditary master to kneel before the spiritual tribunal of the hereditary bondman. The childhood of Europe was passed under the guardianship of priestly teachers; who taught, as the scene in the Sistine chapel of an Ethiopian addressing the proud rulers of Catholic Christendom teaches, that no distinction is regarded at Rome save that which divides the priest from the people.

"The sermon of the Abyssinian"—that is, of this colored person, this Roman citizen of "African descent"—"in beautiful print was distributed at the door. I bring one home as a trophy and as a souvenir of a great truth which Americans are prone to deny or condemn." [Laughter.]

Now, I ask my friend from Ohio if he has still got that trophy and souvenir to bring into this Hall?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will allow me to reply I will do so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe I have never in my life refused to yield to my friend from Ohio, but he refused to yield to me when he had the floor just now, and as, of course, I always like to be equal with him in politeness, I must decline to yield now.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to treat the gentleman with discourtesy by refusing to answer his question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. COLE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Then I will say, with the permission of the gentleman from California—

[Shouts of "Order!" and "Object!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce the rule. When a gentleman declines to yield he shall be protected in his right to speak without interruption.

Mr. COX. I have not heard the gentleman from California decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. COLE, of California. No, sir; I cannot yield any further, as it would be taken out of my time.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the morning-hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The bill of the House to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1864, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, was taken up and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

An act (S. No. 12) extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grants of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

CLAIMS OF PERUVIAN CITIZENS.

An act (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of January 12, 1863, was the next bill taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL THOMAS.

Joint resolution (S. No. 11) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas, and the officers and men who fought under his command at the battle of Chickamauga, was the next business taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it in order to move an amendment to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move to amend by inserting the name of Major General W. S. Rosecrans before that of General Thomas, so that it will read "to Major General W. S. Rosecrans and Major General George H. Thomas, and to the officers and men under them."

Mr. WILSON. I believe that this House has already passed a joint resolution of thanks to General Rosecrans.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS. We had better wait and have a separate resolution for General Rosecrans.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. So I think. I believe that these resolutions ought to stand each by itself. This is a special resolution of thanks to the officers and men who fought the battle of Chickamauga, and I am not prepared, with the information I have in regard to that battle, to vote for or against a resolution of thanks to Major General Rosecrans. At all events it seems to me that each resolution should be acted on separately.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this resolution has come before the House of Representatives as it is now presented. I had hoped I should not be compelled to refer publicly to the matters involved in it, and before I speak to the merits of the resolution itself I must be indulged in the expression of my opinion in regard to the custom which is growing up in this body in reference to this class of resolutions. The practice of this House during the brief period in which I have been a member has led me to fear that the thanks of the Congress of the United States are becoming too cheap an article in the eulogistic literature of the world. Time was when a man must stand grandly preëminent in the estimation and affection of the American people to receive through the solemn forms of law the thanks of the nation through its Representatives in Congress assembled. To merit that was worth a lifetime of sacrifice and heroism. We have changed this worthy custom. Since this session began many resolutions of thanks have been passed without being referred to the appropriate committees, without remarks, and almost without notice. They have been passed tacitly by a kind of common consent. We have not only thanked officers who were chiefs of armies, but also those who held subordinate positions in the various armies of the Republic. No question has been asked whether the officer was entitled to this distinction, or whether by thanking one another was not robbed of his merited honor. I repeat that I have seen these things with a feeling that we are cheapening the thanks of Congress by distributing them without discrimination and without question. I have been so willing to thank any man who has served the country in this war that I have not felt disposed to interpose objection.

In many of the instances referred to I have had no knowledge of the merits of the case. But when it comes so close to my own experience and knowledge of the history of the war, I cannot permit a resolution of this kind to pass without my protest against this hasty and thoughtless style of legislation. I have been surprised that the honorable members of this House should treat so lightly the matters involved in thanking the public servants of the nation. I now appeal to your sense of justice whether it be right to single out a subordinate officer, give him the thanks of Congress, and pass his chief in silence. On what grounds are you now ready to ignore the man who has won so many of the proudest victories? I do not believe that such is the purpose or wish of this House.

This resolution proposes to thank Major General Thomas and the officers and men under his command for gallant services in the battle of Chickamauga. It meets my hearty approval for what it contains, but my protest for what it does not contain. I should be recreant to my own sense of justice did I allow this omission to pass without notice. No man here is ready to say—and if there be such a man I am ready to meet him—that the thanks of this Congress are not due to Major General W. S. Rosecrans, for the campaign which culminated in the battle of Chickamauga. It is not uncommon throughout the press of the country, and among many people, to speak of that battle as a disaster to the Army of the United States and to treat of it as a defeat. If that battle was a defeat we may welcome a hundred such defeats. I should be glad if each of our armies would repeat Chickamauga. Twenty such would destroy the rebel army and the confederacy utterly and forever.

What was that battle, terminating as it did a great campaign whose object was to drive the rebel army beyond the Tennessee, and to obtain a foothold on the south bank of that river which should form the basis of future operations in the Gulf States? We had never yet crossed that river, except far below in the neighborhood of Corinth. Chattanooga was the gateway of the Cumberland mountains, and until we crossed the river and held the gateway we could not commence operations in Georgia. The army was ordered to cross the river, to grasp and hold the key of the Cumberland mountains. It did cross, in the face of superior numbers; and after two days of fighting, more terrible, I believe, than any since this war began, the army of the Cumberland hurled back, discomfited and repulsed, the combined power of three rebel armies, gained the key to the Cumberland mountains, gained Chattanooga, and held it against every assault. If there has been a more substantial success against overwhelming odds since this war began, I have not heard of it.

We have had victories—God be thanked—all along the line, but in the history of this war I know of no such battle against such numbers; forty thousand against an army of not less by a man than seventy-five thousand. After the disaster to the right wing in the last bloody afternoon of September 20, twenty-five thousand men of the army of the Cumberland stood and met seventy-five thousand hurled against them. And they stood in their bloody tracks immovable and victorious when night threw its mantle around them. They had repelled the last assault of the rebel army. Who commanded the army of the Cumberland? Who organized, disciplined, and led it? Who planned its campaigns? The general whose name is omitted in this resolution, Major General W. S. Rosecrans.

And who is this General Rosecrans? The history of the country tells you, and your children know it by heart. It is he who fought battles and won victories in Western Virginia under the shadow of another's name. When the poetic pretender claimed the honor and received the reward as the author of Virgil's stanza in praise of Caesar, the great Mantuan wrote on the walls of the imperial palace—

"Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores."

So might the hero of Rich Mountain say, "I won this battle, but another has worn the laurels."

From Western Virginia he went to Mississippi, and there won the battles of Iuka and Corinth, which have aided materially to exalt the fame of that general upon whom this House has been in such haste to confer the proud rank of Lieutenant General of the Army of the United States, but who was not upon either of these battle-fields.

Who took command of the army of the Cumberland, found that army at Bowling Green, in November, 1862, as it lay disorganized, disheartened, driven back from Alabama and Tennessee, and led it across the Cumberland, planted it in Nashville, and thence, on the first day of the new year, planted his banners at Murfreesboro' in torrents of blood, and in the moment of our extremest peril, throwing himself into the breach, saved by his personal valor the army of the Cumberland and the hopes of the Republic? It was General Rosecrans. From the day he assumed the command at Bowling Green the history of that army may be written in one sentence—it advanced and maintained its advanced position, and its last campaign under the general it loved was the bloodiest and most brilliant. The fruits of Chickamauga were gathered in November, on the heights of Mission Ridge and among the clouds of Lookout Mountain. That battle at Chattanooga was a glorious one, and every loyal heart is proud of it. But, sir, it was won when we had nearly three times the number of the enemy. It ought to have been won. Thank God that it was won. I would take no laurel from the brow of the man who won it, but I would remind gentlemen here that while the battle of Chattanooga was fought with vastly superior numbers on our part, the battle of Chickamauga was fought with still vaster superiority against us.

If there is any man upon earth whom I honor it is the man who is named in this resolution, General George H. Thomas. I had occasion in my remarks on the conscription bill a few days ago to refer to him in such terms as I delighted to use; and I say to gentlemen here that if there is any man whose heart would be hurt by the passage of this resolution as it now stands, that man is General George H. Thomas. I know, and all know, that he deserves well of his country, and his name ought to be recorded in letters of gold; but I know equally well that General Rosecrans deserves well of his country. I ask you, then, not to pain the heart of a noble man who will be burdened with the weight of these thanks that wrong his brother officer and his superior in command. All I ask is that you will put both names into the resolution, and let them stand side by side.

Mr. FENTON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO COMMODORE RINGGOLD.

Joint resolution of the Senate No. 19, tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, and that we shall pass the resolution. In a matter of compliment, if we do it quickly we do it twice.

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to the resolution itself; but I think it is a very good rule to send all such resolutions to committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We have passed, without a single exception, every resolution of this kind that has come to us without any reference. [Cries of "Oh! no."] The resolution which has just been before the House, and to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] offered an amendment, was referred, and perhaps very properly, to the Committee on Military Affairs; but I hope that this resolution will be passed by the House as other resolutions have been about which there was no dispute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope this resolution will not be passed by the House now. Similar resolutions have been heretofore referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. If this is all right the presumption is that the committee will report it back. If it is not right, the committee ought to have an opportunity to investigate the facts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The resolution is merely one of thanks to a distinguished naval officer for a deed which entitles him to the thanks of every person in the country—the relief of the storshoop Vermont.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is a question on which the committee should be allowed to pass. The House should not be asked to act on the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not on my statement, but on the statement in the bill itself.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I wish the bill to go to the committee. I am not sufficiently posted in the history of this matter to act upon it, and I wish the instruction of the committee so as to know how to vote.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move the previous question on the reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If this is a matter on which gentlemen have any feeling I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. It is not from any hostility to this proposition that I wish it referred. The committee will undoubtedly sanction it, and its reference will delay its passage for a very short time.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ARMY AMBULANCES.

An act (S. No. 30) to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the armies of the United States was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXAMINATION OF OFFICERS.

An act (S. No. 85) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESTRICTION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

An act (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress, heads of Departments, and other officers of the Government, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage now; and I move the previous question on its third reading.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and FERNANDO WOOD were appointed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As this is a test vote on the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. It is no test vote at all.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-seven, noes not counted.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOHN L. BURNS.

An act (S. No. 1) granting a pension to John L. Burns, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

L. F. CARTEE.

An act (S. No. 19) for the relief of L. F. Cartee was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAYMASTER DORAN.

SALE OF GOLD BY THE UNITED STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. HOOPER. I consider the matter so important that I again ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for the purpose of considering it at this time, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any surplus gold in the Treasury.

Mr. COX. What effect will it have upon commercial exchanges? How much gold is to be sold, and why is it to be sold at this time?

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a matter of importance, and ought to be deliberately considered, and I therefore object.

Mr. HOOPER. Let it be postponed until tomorrow after the morning hour, and then considered as the special order.

Mr. BROOKS. I think that the House is willing to agree to that if we are to have an understanding that debate shall be allowed.

Mr. HOOPER. I do not propose to call for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I think that the House will agree that the bill shall be discussed to-morrow. We are not disposed to delay action unnecessarily, but we want the bill understood before we are called to vote on it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my objection. I am opposed to making it a special order.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill was last under consideration the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] moved to amend the clause "for pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including the engineer corps of the Navy, $19,423,241," by adding thereto the following:

And that the same be paid in gold or its equivalent: Provided, That the relative value of any paper currency tendered shall be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence thereof if dated thirty days before payment is made.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "gold or its equivalent," and inserting in lieu thereof "lawful money of the United States." The pending question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I deem it proper to say that the pending amendment has received the sanction of the Democratic members of the House. It is urged in good faith, as a measure of simple justice to those for whose benefit it is intended. Its object is simply to secure to the sailor, as we propose to secure to the soldier, the price fixed by law for their services in gold or its equivalent. They do not ask or expect more; they certainly should receive nothing less. It is not proposed to apply the provision to any other class of the public servants than those in the naval and military service, for the reason that no other has been called upon to make such sacrifices for the country, and that upon no other rests immediately the burden of its defense; yet this House at the present session, under the lead of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means, provided for the payment of the salaries due our representatives in foreign countries according to the gold standard.

The men who are fighting the battles of the country are, in a peculiar sense, entitled to a larger consideration and to the distinction which is thus proposed to be made in their favor. In lieu of home and domestic endearments, they have accepted and are bearing the privations, sufferings, and perils of a bitter and sanguinary war. Their wives and children are still dependent for support upon their pay, who, deprived by their situation of the means of procuring that support from the ordinary pursuits of life, have relied with undoubting trust upon their engagements with the Government. So long as payment was rendered in coin or its equivalent, the soldier's pay being thirteen dollars per month for the private, and the seaman's about the same, which is not equal upon the average to the earnings from civil occupation, was yet such an approximation to that standard as could be contentedly borne. For some time back, however, owing to the excessive inflation of the paper issues of the Government, the departure from the gold standard has been constantly increasing, until at this time a dollar in greenbacks is worth only about sixty-four cents in gold. In consequence of this depreciation the soldier's pay is actually reduced to about eight dollars per month. It is well known that the means of living have advanced in a ratio even greater than that corresponding with the depreciation of the currency.

This condition of things falls with especial severity upon that class of men who have already made greater sacrifices than any other in taking up arms in the common cause. Can the Government properly do less than preserve the faith of its solemn engagements by at once restoring the compensation to the value which it possessed when the war commenced? They have performed their part of the contract with noble fidelity and zeal. Antietam, Vicksburg, Gettysburg, and Chattanooga are monuments of their bravery and patriotism which will bear their fame to a distant and admiring future. If anything more were needed to commend the proposition to the acceptance of the House, I think it will be found in the effect the passage of such a measure would have upon enlistments. So long as the soldier is paid as at present, enlistments are asked for with an ill grace, and will be rendered with a tardiness which can hardly be surprising when we consider the change which has been wrought in the terms of engaging in the service, by the depreciation of the money substituted for the constitutional currency.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that many Democrats believe that this war could have been avoided, and now condemn the policy which governs it. Yet at the same time we condemn in unqualified terms the rebellion; are anxious to see it put down; and are determined to stand by any Administration or any policy that will bring the war to a speedy close, and establish in its place peace, an early peace, with the restoration of the Union and the legal and constitutional rights of all the States and all the people fully protected and secured. We believe that when this great object is attained the war ought to cease. But during its progress in the past as well as in the future we recognize the seamen and soldiers of the Army as having gone forward to fight the battles of constitutional government, and are at least entitled to our justice. Wherever any part of that great Army has moved, upon the water or upon the land, its ranks have been filled with thousands of gallant Democrats, many of whom now sleep in soldiers' graves. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican gentlemen of the House are in the majority, and that this proposition for the benefit of the soldier cannot be carried by Democrats alone. I trust, then, that it will not be prejudiced for the reason that it has emanated from a Democratic caucus and will receive the undivided vote of the Representatives of the Democratic party, but that it will obtain a generous support and become a law.

Mr. McBRIDE. As the Representative of a people who in my election disregarded all partisan issues, I took my seat upon this floor with an earnest wish to imitate their sacrifice of political associations and to work earnestly and heartily with those whose purpose was to vindicate the imperiled integrity of the nation and compel obedience to its legitimate authority.

Coming from the shores of the Pacific, from among a people many of whom know by experience the inconvenience and the sense of helplessness to which a want of the protection of the national ensign consigned them, I speak for them and their devotion to the integrity of the Union with something of the feeling that is supposed to be peculiar to those who have suffered from the oppressions of other Governments and have at last found protection and a home beneath the folds of our own banner.

In early youth, after a weary journey of two thousand miles from the border of civilization in the valley of the Mississippi, I found myself on the banks of the Columbia, within hearing of the roar of the great ocean into which it falls, in the midst of a wilderness of mountain and solitude, with only a handful of brave but hardy pioneers to whom I could appeal for protection and a home. The ownership of the country was undetermined; the value and resources of it were unknown; the subjects of the British Crown exceeded in number the residents who were American citizens, and the majesty of national authority was unfelt and unknown.

I often heard, sir, in those days of our young State's early history, the American citizen express his hope that the day might soon come when we could hoist the flag of freedom above our homes again and enjoy its blessings and protection. And when a toil-worn emigrant arrived from the far-off land which we still loved to call home, and brought a tattered newspaper to the friend who preceded him, its soiled pages were eagerly scanned to know if yet the vexed question of boundary had been settled, or whether we still must invoke in vain the rights of American citizenship. The painful disappointment, the deep expressions of regret and despair which were common around me as year by year passed away and we were left without notice and without aid or protection from the home Government, left an impression upon my heart of the passionate devotion of an American citizen to the flag and institutions of his country which I shall ever remember with the pride of one who believes that devotion to be not only just but honorable. And, sir, when after years of longing and impatience the news came that the title to the domain where our weak and scattered settlements were located was confirmed to the American Government a thrill of patriotic joy ran throughout their length; and when, on the 3d of March, 1849, the little ship that bore him to our shores landed the Governor appointed by the President at Oregon City, and his proclamation announcing that the laws of the United States were extended over the country for its protection was issued, none but those who witnessed the feeling that it invoked and the demonstrations which greeted it can realize the joy that pervaded the community at again being beneath the protecting care of the parent Government.

I allude to this part of the history of our State to show how early and ardent has been the attachment of its citizens to the central Government, and when, in the height of its prosperity we felt not only its want of care but its cold and cruel neglect, the first exhibition of a sense of justice toward us was met by demonstrations of gratitude and affection which showed how deep a hold the love of our common country had upon the hearts of our people. And the patriotism which they evinced then they cherish now; no trick of politics or device of traitors can draw them away from the shrine of the Union and their devotion to the Constitution of the Republic. That dream of despairing treason, the establishment of a Pacific republic, though for long years cherished in secret as part of the plan to make feasible a southern confederacy, had no charm to allure the people from their firm allegiance.

Though the Democratic party had, up to the inception of this rebellion, a majority consisting of almost two to one of the votes of the State with it, and the chosen leader of it had been long the recipient of the confidence and highest honors of the people of the State, and in the interests of his treasonable party association forgot his own allegiance, yet all these influences failed to drag the people of our State from the lofty height of patriotic duty. With every reason that partisan association and prejudices could devise to seduce them from the path of patriotism they stood fast and true, and I stand here to-day to express my gratitude to the thousands of patriotic Democrats who, in defiance of the influences that had demoralized their party in the interests of secession and placed its organization in the hands of its friends and sympathizers in the Pacific States, nobly rallied to the side of the constituted authorities and have been their firm and unwavering supporters through all the storm and doubt of this fierce rebellion.

With these facts illustrating the Unionism of the masses in the State from which I come—and perhaps from the locality, more than anything else, feeling less interest in those questions, the decision of which in favor of the North by the president's election of 1860 furnished the pretext for this rebellion—and having no bitterness to revenge upon political enemies, I repeat, sir, I came here with an honest desire and an earnest purpose to cooperate with men of all parties in aiding to restore the authority of the Government, and, I might add, with the belief that among all parties in this great and glorious work the Government would find friends. A few months, however, sir, passed in the States upon this side of the continent prior to the opening of the present session of Congress dispelled that hope and belief which I had so ardently cherished, and I found myself compelled to choose between two parties upon this floor, as clearly defined in principle and purpose and as antagonistic to each other as two political parties can be under the same Government and yet maintain the public peace.

I find, it is true, some gentlemen upon the other side of the House who evince occasionally both by voice and vote an earnest purpose to aid the constituted authorities in maintaining the integrity of the Republic, but I regret to say that they seem too few in numbers and feeble in influence to materially affect the action of their party; and I have yet to hear the boast of last winter on this floor that the Democratic party, arrayed against the Administration, was a "war party," or has any longer any such pretensions.

As a Union man, therefore, representing a thoroughly loyal Union constituency, I could find no other friends upon whom I could safely rely to honestly labor for the restoration of the national authority than those with whom it has been my pleasure and honor to act.

The pretense upon which the Democratic party carried the election a year ago, that they were for a more vigorous prosecution of the war, seems now no longer insisted upon, and even those who thus succeeded on a belligerent platform are today understood to be as fully indoctrinated with the "peace principles" that propose to disarm this wicked rebellion of its bloody purpose by some scheme of concession to its guilty authors as the known champion of southern interests, Mr. Vallandigham himself.

But I do not make this charge upon that party upon the basis of its action during the past summer only. I go further, and affirm that from the time it drove men like Johnson, of Tennessee, Holt, of Kentucky, Dickinson and Cochrane, of New York, Conness, of California, and Noell, of Missouri, and men like them, outside the pale of its organization, it has been an anti-war party, and a substantial ally of this infamous and treasonable rebellion which seeks to destroy the best Government that human wisdom ever devised.

The fact that such men, the soundness of whose partisan opinions was never impeached, were compelled to renounce their associations, is sufficient evidence of the real animus of the organization, but the developments of the last year are sufficient to establish from their own declarations that the charge which I have made against them is as disgraceful as it is true.

Why, sir, turn to the Journals of this body at its last session. On the 19th day of December, 1862, the bill making appropriations for the Army was voted upon; and you will find that of the forty-eight members upon that side of the House voting that day only ten recorded their votes in favor of the passage of the bill. Thirty-five absented themselves at roll-call, and three, with a manly boldness which is an honor to their sincerity though little to their patriotism, voted against the bill. There, sir, stands their record on the practical question of pay and supplies for the gallant armies that were then fighting to maintain the honor of the Republic, and whose wounds yet bleeding and fresh from the terrible slaughter of Fredericksburg found neither comfort nor aid at the hands of their Democratic brothers in this House, who had in many cases urged them to volunteer and go into the war so long as it was hoped that such a course would make McClellan President, and who utterly forsook them so soon as they found that their political expectations from the Army were not to be realized. And to show the inconsistency of those who oppose the Government in prosecuting this war, some of the same gentlemen who refused to record their votes in favor of a bill which gave wages and clothing and food to our brave soldiers who were facing the enemy in deadly conflict, have been voting resolutions to increase the pay of the same men at the present session. Last year they would have had the Government violate its contract to pay them by leaving it without the means; this year they propose to pay them more than the Government agreed. This inconsistency in action is explained by its entire consistency of purpose; by leaving them without any pay last year they hoped to create disaffection toward the Government; then by telling them that they ought to have more pay than they now get, they seek to foment disaffection now. To weaken and demoralize the soldiers in the field being their purpose, this singularly diverse action is easily understood. They assail the Government and seek to gain possession of the citadel of its power in as many ways as the burglar does who striving to enter the house which he proposes to rob, tries first to break his way with sledge and bar, and failing resorts to the milder means of a false key, and foiled in all, rings the bell and asks admission to the parlor of his victim in the character of a gentleman!

To prove how soon the Democratic leaders of the country became disciples of peace after the removal of General McClellan from the command of the army of the Potomac, I have but to refer to a few facts known to the country as part of the history of the time. Even the energetic member from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] who is so frequently and prominently before the House, and who only a short time since deliberately voted and spoke in favor of a resolution to send commissioners to Jefferson Davis to sue for peace, only one year ago was one of the most active friends of volunteering in his section of the State; and yet, sir, strange as it may seem, this rampant "war man" anterior to McClellan's removal, lapses in a few revolving moons into a meek advocate of an inglorious peace, and the warm supporter of his late colleague, Mr. Vallandigham, for the office of Governor of the State of Ohio. The conversion of Saul of Tarsus from the character of a firm persecutor of the disciples of the Prince of Peace into that of a humble follower is said in his own account to have occupied three days, and the process was considered sudden, although the shock was so great as to produce temporary loss of sight. How long the gentleman from Ohio labored under conviction before he rejoiced in the light of a new life we may not precisely know, but in mercy to the subject let us hope that the good Providence who watched over both the ancient and modern conversion permitted the latter's mental vision, as a less punishment, to be totally obscured, but did not allow the three days of bodily agony which the apostle suffered, "sorrowing without meat or drink."

But, sir, I will leave these personal reflections and call attention to other testimony.

The State of Indiana has shown by every act of her patriotic people that she was emphatically in favor of crushing the rebellion by force of arms; and the conclusive evidence of that is found in the creditable fact that in the President's various calls for troops she has always exceeded the demand made upon her. And yet the Democratic committee of her Legislature, chosen in the very height of the war fever which swept through the Northwest in 1862, in the winter following issued an address in which this quotation occurs:

"The State possesses no power in theory or in fact to stay the armies which now stand in battle array; and though the Christian and humane mind of Indiana might desire to see the effusion of blood prevented, it, alas! is powerless to stop the carnage which is hurrying her sons to early and 'stranger' graves."

See the smooth folds of the secession viper beneath this ingenious sentence. Her people are told that their sons are filling "stranger" graves; that when they pass beyond the limits of their own State they are upon "stranger" soil; that though the national flag waves alike in supremacy of law over every rood of ground that ever acknowledged the national authority, yet when the brave defenders of that authority march to its defense, when treason has torn it from its place, they are told that they are marching upon "stranger" soil, and invading the land of a foreign enemy. They continue:

"The committee are far from thinking that war is the rightful remedy for our national troubles; they believe the reverse to be true;" &c.

So much for the peace organization which so suddenly sprang into vigorous existence at the period of our national adversity a year ago in the State of Indiana. I turn now to Connecticut, one of the New England States. The party having control of the Democratic organization in that State placed in the field as their candidate for the office of Governor at the last annual election a gentleman who, in a letter which was said to have been addressed by him to a southern rebel—to the truth of this I cannot speak, but the authenticity of the letter has, I believe, been admitted—declared that—

"I abhor the whole scheme of southern invasion, with all its horrible consequences of rapine and plunder."

"Thousands of us are beginning to see there can be no Union got in this way."

"Those who drive the car of war at this time have no more idea of saving the Union by their bloody sacrifices than they have of changing the course of nature."

In speaking of the new levies of that year for troops he characterizes them as demands "for the hospitals, the marshes, the ditches, and gun-boat shambles;" and winds up his dolorous epistle by denouncing the war for the Union as an "iniquity which [he] would be found exposing to the end of the chapter;" and adding that "things have gone so far now that the only possible chance [to restore the Union] will be by the adoption of a Christian policy, very different from that which at present prevails at Washington."

See how skillfully the doctrine of secession is again made to underlie this whole letter. The attempt to take possession of the property owned and held by the Government in the southern States and disperse those who were seeking the destruction of its admitted authority with arms in their hands, is called "a scheme of southern invasion," as if this Government had not a right, if necessary, to occupy every foot of the national territory. This talk about the "invasion" of southern territory shows how fully the Democratic organization of the present day has been imbued with the idea of State supremacy which was the political heresy from which all our present troubles have come, and sounds strangely at variance with the denunciations which have been applied within the last few weeks to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania who sits near me, [Mr. STEVENS,] for announcing what they call a similar doctrine. Like the inebriate who fancied that his friends were intoxicated and he only sober, these gentlemen charge upon others the sin which is most apparent in themselves, and I suggest to them the language of Scripture, "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

This letter was written in July, 1862, months before that Christian policy which the writer alluded to was adopted at Washington. I mean (what he did not) the policy of calling to the aid of the national forces the sympathies and assistance, the hearts and hands of the slaves that had tilled the fields and grown the subsistence upon which the insurgents depended. So that whatever excuses others might have given for their opposition to the war, growing out of the emancipation of slaves, the author of this letter can now plead no such apology.

I will not occupy my time in reading extracts from the speeches of Vallandigham, or from the letters and utterances of Judge Woodward, or of Wickliffe of Kentucky, to prove the unfaithfulness of the Democratic party to the duty of prosecuting this war, as its sentiments are proclaimed by its chosen leaders in the various States. Suffice it to say that the proof is ample and overwhelming. If anything further were wanting, it is found in the votes of the minority upon this floor since the beginning of the present Congress.

It was well said by a friend who sits near me, that when the wants of the Government were such that their aid was not needed it was tendered with alacrity; but when measures which most required unanimity were demanded it was persistently and factiously refused by the minority.

The bill authorizing bounties for volunteers, when it could be used to postpone the only just and sure method of filling up the wasted ranks of the Army—by draft—was readily sanctioned; but when the bill for the perfection of the system for calling the necessary forces into the field, demanded by every consideration of patriotism and duty, was pending, it was delayed day after day by tedious efforts at amendment, and at last passed after hours of frivolous waste of time in dilatory motions to impede its passage.

Sir, the same impatience of control and denial of the right of the majority to rule, which this southern rebellion has exemplified, finds its counterpart upon this floor. Why was it, sir, that we wasted two days, in large part, upon this floor in deciding dilatory motions by yeas and nays, a proceeding which the people everywhere view as not only disgraceful, but which, if persisted in, would lead to a suspension of the legislative branch of the Government, and finally to anarchy and revolution? And where, sir, is the American citizen who would not blush when told that the measure, the passage of which was thus savagely resisted, was simply a resolution affirming the language of the Constitution on the subject of the punishment of treason! It is because, sir, they are a party of revolution, allied in principle with the causes which led to this rebellion; and, much as they may seek to conceal it, the sympathy between them will, despite all their efforts, color their line of conduct. And, sir, if you want to know whether those gullible men who are bearing our flag through the storm of battle to a final triumph have met with a temporary check, look into the smiling countenance of some gentleman who anathematizes this "abolition war." You can tell from his complacent brow that it is unnecessary to patronize the newsboy to the extent of the price of an evening paper to get the news. Your country's reverses are written in the smile that plays sneeringly on the features before you. And if you want to know how Jeff. Davis's heart beats, take your friend by the wrist, and you will soon get the gauge of the rebel pulse.

I do not mean that these remarks shall apply to all who are associated with the minority in this House. I am happy to know that there are exceptions to this general tendency of the policy of that party, and I regret to be compelled to say they are but exceptions and nothing more.

While I am upon this subject permit me to allude for a moment to the extraordinary spectacle presented on this floor on the day of the organization of this body. By the singular rule adopted by the Clerk of this body at its last session, a number of gentlemen found themselves likely to be defrauded of their right to seats on this floor. And then and here we witnessed a development which startled men for the moment, of a deliberate conspiracy to disfranchise a number of the loyal States, and by a quibble, as narrow as it was mean, give the minority the control of the organization of this House. And, sir, the men who always and persistently claim that they are for the rule of the people were here voting to sustain that infamous conspiracy.

The State of Louisiana, steeped as she is in the crime of treason, without any organized government except what the General Government has established over her by force, without State officers, and without even the semblance of a fair election or legally authenticated certificates, sent here two men to claim seats upon this floor, the name of one of whom was written upon the secession ordinance of the State when she forgot her allegiance to the Union; and though all these facts were known to the world, in defiance of all decency they took their places on the floor of this Hall. And not content, sir, with this outrage upon the privileges of this House, the Representatives from loyal States that had never been in rebellion or in sympathy with rebellion were excluded from their places, while these interlopers, who had no more right than a sinner has to a seat in heaven, were quietly installed in these cushioned chairs in the national Congress. And to prove conclusively that all this had a partisan purpose, members elected by a majority counted by thousands, as was the case with myself, were not only excluded by this arbitrary ruling of the late Clerk, but when the motion was made to insert their names upon the roll of members of the House, the whole vote on the other side of the House, including the two who were swindled in from Louisiana, was cast solid against us. Talk about the crime of secession! What term of reproach can truthfully characterize this bald attempt to disfranchise whole States at a single blow? Gentlemen have shown a great deal of indignation at the alleged usurpations of the military in regard to elections. I do not apologize for these things if true; but I do say that such affected indignation comes with an ill grace from those who deliberately cast their votes on this floor to disfranchise whole States by a legislative decree. Sir, legislative usurpation is no more tolerable with me than military usurpation; and with this record behind them I should think that our friends on the other side would not have much taste for discussing the question of the disfranchisement of the people. But enough of this. I am merely stating the reasons which have operated on my mind as a Union man, whose sole object and purpose here are to serve the cause of our imperiled Union, and to give every aid and assistance that I can to its authorities in maintaining its integrity, for coöperating with those on this side of the House. I have indicated the objects and animus of the organization of the peace party on this floor and in the country, and shown that neither taking its professions or practice is it to be trusted, and now, sir, I desire to state affirmatively why I go heartily with the gentlemen elected as Republicans and as Union men, who occupy seats on this side of the Chamber.

We are in the midst of the grandest struggle of either ancient or modern times. A war whose gigantic proportions stretch along a navigable line of coast and river some five thousand miles in length; that embraces an area of territory larger than was ever before submitted to the arbitrament of a single contest, involving an expenditure of money and of life which has no parallel in modern history, has been for two years and a half drawing upon the resources and exhausting the energies of our people. A war begun strictly on our part in self-defense, and conducted with all the mildness which a kind-hearted Chief Magistrate could throw into the contest, it has at last reached a point where one side or the other must be conquered. Begun in order to perpetuate and aggrandize an institution the very existence of which in our free Government has ever been a standing reproach in the eyes of the civilized world, and has almost neutralized our example as a republican nation, it has gone on increasing in intensity and bitterness until no one pretends, with any sort of reason, that the cause of the war can survive the struggle. Slavery, in a moment of folly, mad with its own power, precipitated a conflict that can now only end in its destruction.

Without cause, and, I may add, without excuse, the champions of slavery began the war, made its existence an issue, and now, sir, they must take the consequences of their action. As an institution which it was thought the national Government dare not attack, it was made the bulwark behind which rebellion was to intrench itself in safety; and standing as it did in front of the enemy, as its breastwork and defense, we were compelled to either demolish it or give up the contest. It is the very life of military success that we strike our enemy where he will most keenly suffer from the blow. If we mean to be victorious we must do that which will inflict upon him the greatest injury and harm as the least; and, sir, by destroying slavery in the rebellious States we deprive our enemies of every essential element of success. We not only destroy the means of success but we destroy the motive to rebel. Take away slavery and they have nothing to fight with and nothing to fight for. Hence, sir, I stand with the Union party of this House. The destruction of the institution in the rebel States is a necessity to the restoration of the Union, and I am for standing by those who will enforce that policy.

It is my misfortune to differ with many gentlemen around me in regard to the capacity and destiny of the African race. While slavery was undermining white society and threatening its ruin it did little by way of enlightening the slave; and I am glad to know that there are gentlemen on this floor, who do not share these opinions with me, and who believe in the capacity of the freedmen to become prosperous residents and owners of the soil, who nevertheless are looking to the means of freeing him from the contact with demoralizing influences and the prejudices of a large portion of our people. I hail with pleasure, therefore, sir, every suggestion which looks to their voluntary emigration from among us; and when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day alluded to their natural tendency toward the tropical latitude of this continent, he presented a suggestion which, if properly improved, will prove a wise and practical solution of a problem of our social existence which is liable to become a dangerous and disturbing question. Sympathizing fully with the necessity for emancipation, it will nevertheless bring evils upon portions of the country which the highest wisdom can only modify, not neutralize.

Sir, if I may be permitted to say so here, I will say that I never was an abolitionist. It is not perhaps to my credit that I am not. I never believed in that wire-drawn theory of the transcendental reformers who insist upon the propriety of conferring equal political and social privileges upon all races. I do believe, and always have, that every man had a natural right to his liberty, and that could only be taken from him when the good and safety of the community were involved. Slavery I always hated as an abomination in the sight of God and all good men; but because I deny the right for you to enslave Sally and Dinah I do not admit that I am bound to marry one or the other, and because I deny that you have the right to sell and oppress the negro I must place him in the same relative position with other white citizens. Natural rights are God-given and inherent, and I concede them to all; political rights are relative, conferred by the State, and may be given or withheld as the body politic may deem best.

Entertaining these opinions, I confess I have always been too conservative to be able to adopt the opinions of the party known in the history of the country as the abolition party. But these are, for the present of course, only abstract opinions, and I do not choose to discuss them. I only present them that I may not be understood to concede doctrines which I deny, or that such concession is involved by the grounds which I assume.

Auxiliary to this scheme of abolishing slavery in the rebellious territory is that other plan for arming the freed population. We all realize what a change has been wrought in the public sentiment of the country in relation to this question. And, sir, whether it is because the people in the pressure for men to fill the quotas of troops demanded were willing to waive their prejudices in relation to this class of persons, and accept aid wherever it could be obtained, or have come to the conclusion more complimentary to the prowess of the colored volunteer, the fact is that public sentiment not only justifies but demands their employment wherever they can be used to crush this rebellion. It not only aids in recruiting the ranks of our Army and destroying the basis of the rebel power, but it makes the future existence of the institution of bondage impossible.

It is singular that while the prejudices of the northern people long prevented the employment of negroes to aid in overthrowing the power of the rebellion the rebels were too wise to be betrayed into such folly. Within one month from the time when the State of Tennessee was forced out of the Union her Legislature passed and her Governor signed the following enactment:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee: That from and after the passage of this act the Governor shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to receive into the military service of the State all male free persons of color between the ages of fifteen and fifty, or such numbers as may be necessary, who may be sound in mind and body, and capable of actual service.

"2. Be it further enacted, That such free persons of color shall receive each eight dollars per month as pay, and such persons shall be entitled to draw each one ration per day, and shall be entitled to a yearly allowance each for clothing.

"3. Be it further enacted, That in order to carry out the provisions of this act it shall be the duty of the sheriffs of the several counties in this State to collect accurate information as to the number and condition, with the names of free persons of color subject to the provisions of this act, and shall, as it is practicable, report the same in writing to the Governor.

"4. Be it further enacted, That a failure or refusal of the sheriffs, or any one or more of them, to perform the duties required shall be deemed an offense, and on conviction thereof shall be punished as a misdemeanor.

"5. Be it further enacted, That in the event of a sufficient number of free persons of color to meet the wants of the State shall not tender their services, that the Governor is empowered, through the sheriffs of the different counties, to press such persons until the requisite number is obtained.

"6. Be it further enacted, That when any mess of volunteers shall keep a servant to wait on the members of the mess, each servant shall be allowed one ration."

"This act to take effect from and after its passage."

Earnestly engaged in the struggle for rebellious success they did not stop to quibble over the color of the fingers that drew trigger upon the soldiers of the Union, but wisely determined that help was what they needed, and whether it came in the shape of white or black men they accepted it for the good of their cause. They set us the example of arming the negro, and they have no right to complain if we fight them with weapons of their own choosing.

At New Orleans prior to the Federal occupation of the city they had a full regiment of African soldiers; and the first colored regiment organized by General Butler was made of the same men who had been conscripted under rebel rule but embraced the first opportunity to desert to us and declare for the Union.

I do not stop to inquire into the constitutionality of the emancipation of slaves and their employment in the armies of the Union.

When red-handed treason is grappling at the throat of the nation it is no time to higgie about the means of defense. If any man's code of action was such that he could not defend himself from the assault of a robber or an assassin without violating it, he deserves to be mulct or murdered; and if the occasion arose when he must break his rule or lose his life I should honor his breach of a creed not worth preserving. And, sir, if the framers of our Constitution so made it that our Government was to have no powers of resistance when assailed by traitors it deserves the destruction to which such an instrument would be doomed. Such a construction of it would be an imputation upon its illustrious authors of an imbecility which my respect for their memory will not permit me to indulge. I have no scruples on that score. I do not believe that when a traitor raises the sword to strike at the heart of the Union he has a right to cram the Constitution into the face of its defender, and say, "You have no right to take life without due process of law." By the very act of resistance to it he loses all the benefits which it confers upon the citizen.

I will not insult the memories of those who framed our Constitution by intimating that they made a Government which when it most needed it had least power; committed the supreme folly of making a Government that could only exist by sufferance, and was at the entire mercy of any set of traitors who might seek its destruction. Sir, they did not do it. It is of the very essence of Government that it possess the power of self-preservation, as it is of life that its possessor has the right to preserve it by any means which necessity demands. A Government that does not possess this right is a cheat and a shadow. Do gentlemen who deny the right of this Government remember the history of their own party?

The last administration under Mr. Buchanan spent $20,000,000 in subduing a petticoat rebellion in the mountain-girt Territory of Utah. No lack of power was found while the rebels consisted of only a large assortment of females, but when the champions of slavery were in arms instead of the exhausted defenders of polygamy, we suddenly discover a great want of power!

But, sir, I have a little authority on this subject which I desire to submit. Within the recollection of all of us, Mr. Chairman, Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War of the United States. During the progress of those disgraceful scenes which reddened the virgin soil of Kansas with the blood of brothers it pleased the Chief Magistrate of the nation to declare certain classes of our citizens there in a state of rebellion. They denied that resistance to the bogus laws forced upon them by a Legislature elected by a Missouri mob was rebellion; but the Administration claimed that it was, and Mr. Davis, as Secretary of War, ordered the military forces of the United States to disperse those people wherever found, and here is an extract from his letter of instruction to General Persifer F. Smith, then in command of that department:

"The position of the insurgents is that of open rebellion against the laws and constitutional authorities, with such manifestations of a purpose to spread devastation over the land as no longer justifies further hesitation or indulgence. Patriotism and humanity alike require that rebellion should be promptly crushed."

We have heard of "chickens coming home to roost," and I think a better illustration of this homely adage was never found than in this case. What he said in 1856 I echo in 1864: "Patriotism and duty alike require that rebellion should be promptly crushed." Sir, when he was in authority and others were supposed to question it no difficulty of a constitutional character was found to prevent his crushing it; no right of the majority to prescribe their own government, nowadays called secession, was permitted to intervene between rebellion and punishment.

As to the lawful rights of those in the rebellious territory I have no difficulty. I believe neither in the doctrine of State rights nor State suicide. A loyal citizen of this Government cannot have his rights taken from him by the act of his neighbors. The result of their action may deprive him of the means of asserting and exercising them, but they exist in him legally unimpaired. And a man who repudiates his duties to this Government can, in my opinion, claim nothing from it. The doctrine that a State can commit political suicide is completely answered by that provision of the Constitution which says that the "United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." It is made our duty to preserve what a majority of the citizens of a State might seek to destroy, the integrity of the form of the State government; and so long as one man within its limits stands by his allegiance and defies the rule of rebellion, he has a right to claim from this Government the enforcement of the covenant.

Entertaining these views, I have no hesitation in indorsing the plan of the President for restoring the State governments. It looks to their preservation instead of annihilation, and presents a practical plan by which the constitutional guarantee can be made effective. The preliminary oath required seems to me to be without objection. The complaint that it is an imputation upon the loyalty of a faithful citizen seems frivolous. As well might a man claim that to require an oath to speak the truth as a prerequisite to delivering testimony in a court of justice was an impeachment of his veracity. This tenderness about taking extra-constitutional oaths has its origin in a sympathy for traitors which I think is too apparent to be misunderstood.

But our friends on the other side insist upon having the "Union as it was and the Constitution as it is;" a very pretty ad captandum phrase, but in my humble opinion a very senseless one. Are our friends in earnest when they say that they want another rule like that which swayed this Government under Buchanan? Do they desire to witness the recurrence of those disgraceful events which brought a stain upon our national honor which can never be wiped away? Are they willing even for the sake of the spoils to see us again wallowing in the slough of infamy into which the last Administration plunged this nation? Do they hunger so for the flesh-pots of Egypt that they are willing to see us prostrating every interest, State and national, to the perpetuation and fostering of that foul curse and reproach to the Republic, human bondage; when Cobb squandered the public moneys till the public Treasury became bankrupt, and your bonds fell to seventy-five cents on the dollar in a time of profound peace; when Thompson embezzled the funds which had been sacredly intrusted to his care to aid in the humane and charitable purpose of elevating the savage from a state of barbarism to that of civilization; when Floyd remained in authority that he might rob and steal on a scale commensurate with his unrivaled capacity; when, in fact, every Department had become so corrupt that the whole fabric came nigh tumbling to pieces from its own rottenness? No, sir. They will pardon me when I say I doubt their sincerity. "The Union as it was?" as well might you seek to crowd the condor who soars among the snowy summits of the Andes into the tiny shell from which he sprang, as to replace the American Union in the same position which it occupied prior to this rebellion.

Sir, these three long years of bloody, wasting, devastating war have not taught us a useless lesson. The noble martyrs who have gone down in this fierce struggle for the nation's existence and regeneration have not made their last sacrifice for the barren, fruitless result of restoring the very condition of things which superinduced the strife. It was for no such ignoble purpose that the gallant Lyon died on the plain of Springfield, or that other martyr from my own far-off State, the lion-hearted, the eloquent Baker, whose brave words rang through this nation like a trumpet-blast calling its people to the defense of the national honor. It was for no such trifling purpose that he fell, the murdered victim of a traitorous commander-in-chief. Go ask the martyred brave who people the graves that line the swamps of the Peninsula and rest in the lonely tombs that rise on the banks and bayous of the Mississippi, if they are willing that their sacrifices should end in replacing the Union in the same condition it was when this wanton, bloody, and infamous rebellion began. It is enough to make them start from their dust to suggest the inquiry. After our terrible experience in taming this monster of slavery we are not going to leave the serpent with his fangs undrawn. The people of this nation, who have yielded up so much of life and treasure in this wicked rebellion, will never be content until they can know that its recurrence is impossible, and gentlemen might as well talk of recalling the past or of reanimating the fallen dead as to talk of the Union as it was.

Mr. Chairman, I am for the Union with every star in its place, redeemed, regenerated, and purified, as it will be by this war.

And now, sir, I wish to make a few observations in regard to our duty here.

This war has shown one thing clearly, and that is, that the people on both sides are in earnest. And I may add that if in this respect there is any difference, the rebels are more thoroughly in earnest than are we. Myself a native of a southern State, and knowing the spirit that animates that people, I can understand the desperate energy which they have thrown into this contest. I do not believe the tales that have from time to time been told us with regard to the affection of the people for the Union and their forced submission to the rebellion. They are, in my opinion, the most thoroughly united people in this contest that ever threw down the gage of battle. Every slaveholder is fighting with the desperation of despair to retain his property; and the poor white man who serves in the ranks is fighting with no less determination to prevent being placed by the law on an equality with the slave. It may be said that this latter feeling is all prejudice, and I may grant it. Still it is a fact; and for proof of the strength and bitterness of that prejudice, I appeal to loyal members from the slave States who sit around me.

In my observation the bitterest and most unreasonable pro-slavery men are those who never owned a slave and never will. However wrong they may be, they will remain so till this war has been fought through.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I cannot agree with those humane ideas so frequently advanced on the other side of the House that you ought not to confiscate the property of the rebel in arms—that by doing so you drive him from repentance and prolong the war. I cannot comprehend the principle which permits us to take life with Christian propriety but is shocked at the thought of taking property; and, sir, if we can take life "without process of law," as a means of putting down this rebellion, can we not take property for the same purpose? As to our confiscating property being an incentive to them to continue the contest, they had thrown their all into the contest before, and nothing but success could save it to them.

But to return to the subject. To-day, with all his defeats and reverses, Jeff. Davis defies us with the best army that the confederacy has seen—men who when set in the stern strife of battle are the equals of any in the wide world. The rebellion is compressed, cramped, but it is not broken; and gentlemen deceive themselves who think we are to have an early and easy conquest. A single misfortune to Grant or Meade might place us next autumn no nearer our object than we are to-day; and, sir, I believe that it is our duty to look the danger that threatens in the face and prepare to meet the most tremendous shock of this war. Why was it that Rosecrans lay for months at Stone river after his hard-won victory and the retreat of Bragg? It was his want of men and means to follow. Why was it, when the gallant army of the Potomac had hurled back the discomfited legions of Lee on the bloody hills of Gettysburg, that with victory, Providence, and the "patriotic Potomac" on our side, he yet escaped safely into Virginia? It was because we had not the men and the means to follow. And lastly, when, beneath the banner of Grant, the gallant Hooker—who was robbed of the glory and the laurel of Gettysburg—stormed the cloud-capped heights of Lookout Mountain, and rolled back the tide of the enemy upon the plains of Georgia, why was it that the results of the splendid triumph were lost? It was because we were still without men or means to follow.

And shall this chapter of failures teach us no lesson, or shall we gather from the experience the wisdom which shall bring triumph to the future? Then, sir, let us vote men and money. Provide the means of filling the ranks of the Army, not by tempting men by the sordid motives of pay and bounty, but by that stern call which every nation has a right to make on its people when its existence is at stake—recruit them until success must crown their arms.

Sir, our national credit is already groaning beneath the accumulating debt. We cannot afford to prolong this war. Every day of its continuance adds more than its million dollars to the public debt, and we must close this strife by quick subjugation or provide for a collapse of the national credit. We can end this war in the next campaign. I think my military friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] could draw an act which, if placed on the statute-book, would end all organized rebellion within the next ten months. And I will add that I am ready to vote for just as stringent a conscription law as he has the courage to ask for. And while we are voting buncombe resolutions about increased wages to the soldiers, I hope we shall have a tax bill to provide the money.

When the gentleman from Indiana offered his resolution to raise the pay of soldiers, unconscious that I was left entirely alone, I voted in the negative. I did it, sir, because we were informed that the demands upon our Treasury already crowded its resources; and I was unwilling to promise to pay men who had not asked it money that we did not have, and did not know that we could get. I am for filling the Treasury first, and will talk of distributing the contents afterwards.

I pledge myself here and now to stand by every movement which has for its purpose the replenishing of the Army and the Treasury. I will support the President, while, with an honesty of purpose and a clearness of vision which prove him one of the most illustrious men of modern times, he molds and directs the plans which are to throttle this devil of rebellion; and having thus humbly struggled to do my duty here go home to the noble young State which sent me here and tell the Union-loving people who live among her mountains and valleys that when misfortune came I at least had sought to provide against it to the best of my ability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in reference to the pending amendment which has been advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON.] My people are more than any other affected by the change in the standard of value, and yet they have made no complaint. Very many of them are cheerfully serving in the Army of the United States and receiving as pay what is equivalent to not more than seven dollars a month, and at places where it requires nearly seven dollars a day to live. Notwithstanding that such is the case, and that gold is the standard of value recognized in that country, I have not received a petition from a single soldier asking that they should be paid in gold and not in greenbacks.

Now, I put it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] and those who agree with him that when those men are willing to receive greenbacks, the lawful currency of the United States, there is no good ground of complaint to induce us to amend the bill as proposed.

Mr. C. A. WHITE obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. CRAVENS, who moved that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly bill of the House No. 151, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting tabular statements of the commissioners appointed by the President under the several acts for the release of certain persons held to service in the District of Columbia; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PENALTIES AGAINST TRAITORS.

Mr. HIGBY asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to exclude traitors and alien enemies from the courts of the United States in civil cases, and from the public lands.

Mr. PENDLETON objected.

Mr. CRAVENS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon the House (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of seven hundred and eighty-five citizens of New York, asking Congress to pass such laws as will put the soldiers of our Army on the same footing as to bounty, pay, and pension, without regard to difference of the complexion. As a bill on that subject is before the Senate, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Lieutenant William L. Church, of Iowa, asking to be indemnified for property destroyed by the Sioux Indians under the lead of Inkpa-dutah, at Spirit Lake, in the year 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nancy M. Gansally, formerly widow of Lyman M. Richmond, praying for a renewal of pension or half pay on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That Cornelius Wendell have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the petition of Berendt A. Froiseth, praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement of immigration, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 125) to encourage immigration. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 64) to incorporate the North American Land and Emigration Company, reported it back and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of George W. Fish, praying compensation for services rendered as consul of the United States from the 1st day of April, 1861, to 30th of August, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 32) granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of a wagon road for postal and military purposes, have instructed me to report it back, and recommend that it do not pass, upon the ground that it interferes with the grant to a railroad company in 1856.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 228) confirming the title of Joseph Ford to certain lands in Rice county, in the State of Minnesota, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand copies of the Navy Register, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the Navy Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 126) to amend "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington," passed May 15, 1820; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. JOHNSON.

ALMOND D. FISK.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 112, for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk, deceased, for the purpose of recommitting it to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. It is a bill which was recommended to that committee on my motion a day or two since; but at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] I allowed it to be reconsidered. I want it recommitted, because there is an adverse interest that has not been heard; and it is eminently proper that that interest should be heard before the committee rather than before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated in his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island now moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HOWE. I do not like to have it recommitted; but if I can have any assurance that the adverse interest to which the Senator refers will be here to be heard in any reasonable time, I shall not be disposed to resist it. The fact is this application was made here at the last session of Congress. The Committee on Patents then heard it, and reported a bill; and it passed the Senate by a very decided vote. At the opening of this session it was again recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and this adverse interest has not appeared here yet, in fact, except by proxy. Unless the Senator can give some assurance that this hearing can be had within a reasonable time, I think it unreasonable to ask this delay.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot give any assurance that the adverse interest will come here to protect his rights; but I give this assurance, that if the person does not come here I shall not press any unreasonable delay. But there is an interest that has not been represented here. Now it has got to be represented. It must be heard somewhere. This Senate will not pass a bill affecting any vested right without giving the parties a hearing; and certainly for the convenience of the Senate and all propriety for its hearing before the committee rather than before the Senate. I know nothing about the merits of the case; but I know there is an important adverse interest that has not been represented, and that it is not the fault of that party that he has not been represented. He had reason to believe that this matter was not to be reported upon.

Mr. HOWE. When will he be here?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Wisconsin sin wants me to state when the party will be here. I certainly cannot state it; but if he does not come in a reasonable time I shall not ask for any further delay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be in the power of the committee to report the bill back at any time. It cannot be delayed any time. The Senator from Wisconsin will have control of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

This day having been set apart for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia, on the motion of Mr. GRIMES the mayors of Georgetown (Mr. Addison) and of Washington (Mr. Wallach) were admitted to the floor of the Senate Chamber for the convenience of consultation with Senators on the pending measures.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 82, concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADE. I believe the resolution about permitting the judges of the courts of the District to have the privilege of the Library is the first bill on the Calendar. There was an adverse report from the Committee on the Library, and I wish that resolution to be taken up and disposed of, as I believe it is the first District business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that there is any order about it. I supposed business relating to the District of Columbia was intrusted to my care to be called up whenever I saw fit.

Mr. WADE. I will not oppose you. I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but I will not oppose you.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not aware that that resolution was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or reported by them.

Mr. WADE. It is District business.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not aware of that.

The motion of Mr. GRIMES was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 82) concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia. The bill provides that notaries public for the District of Columbia may be appointed by the supreme court of the District. No new appointment is to be made until the number in the District is reduced to twenty-five; and afterwards vacancies are to be filled by the court as they may occur. Each notary public hereafter appointed, before entering upon the duties of his office, is to take an oath faithfully to discharge them, and to give bond to the United States in the sum of $2,000, with security to be approved by the supreme court or a judge thereof, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. And the court, with reasonable dispatch, by a general order to be published in one or more newspapers printed in the District, is to require all persons now holding the commission of notary public to give new bond; and all persons failing to comply with that order are to be stricken from the list of notaries. Notaries public are to have authority to demand acceptance and payment of foreign bills of exchange, and to protest them for non-acceptance and non-payment; and to exercise such other powers and duties as, by the law of nations, and according to commercial usages, or for use and effect beyond the jurisdiction of this District as, according to the law of any State or Territory of the United States, or any foreign Government in amity with the United States, may be performed by notaries public. Notaries public may also demand acceptance of inland bills of exchange, and payment thereof, and of promissory notes, and may protest them for non-acceptance or non-payment, as the case may require.

Each notary public is to have power to take and to certify the acknowledgment or proof of powers of attorney, mortgages, deeds, and other instruments of writing, the acknowledgment of any conveyance, or other instrument of writing, executed by any married woman, to take depositions, and to administer oaths and affirmations in all matters incident or belonging to the duties of his office, and to take affidavits to be used before any court, judge, or officer within this District. Each notary public is to keep a fair record of his official acts, and, when required, to give a certified copy of any record in his office to any person, upon payment of the fees therefor. Each notary public, before he acts as such, is to provide a notarial seal, with which he shall authenticate all his official acts, which seal, together with his records and official documents, are not to be liable to be seized on by any execution. He must deposit an impression of his official seal in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District. On the death, resignation, or removal from office of any notary public, his records, together with all his official papers, are to be deposited in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District. The original protest of a notary public, under his hand and official seal, of any bill of exchange or promissory note for non-acceptance or non-payment, stating the presentment by him of such bill of exchange or note for acceptance or payment, and the non-acceptance or non-payment thereof, and the service of notice on any or all of the parties to such bill of exchange or promissory note, and specifying the mode of giving such notice, and the reputed place of residence of the party to whom the same was given, and the post office nearest thereto, are to be prima facie evidence of the facts contained therein. The certificate of a notary public, under his hand and seal of office, drawn from his record, stating the protest and the facts therein contained, are also to be evidence of the facts in like manner as the original protest.

The fees of notaries public are to be: for each certificate and seal, fifty cents; for taking depositions or other writings, for each one hundred words, ten cents; for administering an oath, fifteen cents; for taking acknowledgment of a deed or power of attorney, with certificate thereof, fifty cents; for every protest of a bill of exchange or promissory note, and recording the same, $1 75; for each notice of protest, ten cents; for each demand for acceptance or payment, if accepted or paid, one dollar, to be paid by the party accepting or paying the same; and for each noting of protest, one dollar. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are to be repealed.

Mr. HALE. I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia for a moment to the first section, in which the power of appointment is conferred on the supreme court of the District. It strikes me that the same tribunal that has the appointment ought to have the power of removal for cause. There is nothing of that sort in the bill, however.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that they have that power now; but I am perfectly willing that the Senator should propose an amendment to that effect. I will state that at present there is no law regarding the appointment of notaries public, or controlling them, or defining their powers and duties, or specifying their fees, except such as were in existence in Maryland before this District was ceded to the United States, as I am informed by the notaries public. This bill is designed for the purpose of putting on our own statute-book a law that shall regulate the duties of the notaries public, specifying the manner in which they shall be appointed, and the manner in which they shall be amenable to some higher tribunal, and defining their fees. I think, although I am not confident about it, for I do not pretend to know much about the laws of this District—

Mr. WADE. You have no objection to that amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. I think the court have that power now; but I am very well satisfied to accept such an amendment, if the Senator will offer it.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to amend the first section by inserting after the word "District," in line four, the words "who shall have power to remove the same for cause."

Mr. GRIMES. I am satisfied with that amendment. I think there is not any such provision in this bill; but I think the court have the power under it. By reference to the eighth section it will be observed that the bill itself, as reported by the committee, contemplates the power of removal of these officers by the court:

"That on the death, resignation, or removal from office of any notary public, his records," &c.

I am very well satisfied that the court has the power in this District to remove justices of the peace, notaries public, and other officers of that description. I know that it has been done in regard to the justices of the peace since this session of Congress began.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will do no harm to insert it.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. There is another amendment which I think should be made, and to which I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the District Committee. Is there any penalty now for notaries public taking higher fees than are prescribed by the statute?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. If there is not, I think that matter should be provided for in this bill; and I move after the tenth section to add this provision:

"That any notary public who shall take a higher fee than is prescribed by this act shall pay a fine of $100 and be removed from office by the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to move an amendment to limit the number of years to five during which these officers shall serve. I think that will be better than to leave them to serve for life. I have included in my amendment the amendment of my colleague in substance, to give the bill conformity.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert after the word "District," in the fourth line of the first section, the words, "whose term of office shall be five years, and who may be removed by said court for cause;" so that the clause will read:

"That notaries public for the District of Columbia may be appointed by the supreme court of said District, whose term of office shall be five years, and who may be removed by said court for cause."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate have agreed to the other amendment; but by the unanimous consent of the Senate it can be put in this form.

Mr. CLARK. I only insert it in this amendment so as to modify the words a little.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard this as a substitute for the other amendment, if there be no objection, that having been agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

CHARTER OF THE CITY OF GEORGETOWN.

The next bill considered as in Committee of the Whole was the bill (S. No. 81) to amend the charter of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia. It provides that the corporation of Georgetown is not hereafter to be forced to contribute toward the expense of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, more than a certain proportion of the expenses incurred on account of the orphans' court and the office of coroner, which was left blank in the bill to be filled up by the Senate, and one half the expense of opening and repairing roads in the county of Washington west of Rock creek leading to Georgetown. The residue of the expenses of the coroner and the orphans' court are to be defrayed by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That from and after the passage of this act, the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, the corporate authorities of the city of Georgetown, and the county authorities of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, shall contribute to the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington, incurred on account of the orphans' court, the office of coroner and the jail of said county, in the following proportions, to wit: the city of Washington twelve fifteenths, the city of Georgetown two fifteenths, and the county of Washington one fifteenth of said expenses.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment reported by the committee. That amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. By the acts of 1820 and 1826 the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington were distributed between the city of Georgetown, the city of Washington, and the county of Washington, composing that portion of the territory outside of the two cities, thus: the city of Washington was required to pay one half, the city of Georgetown one fourth, and the county one fourth. At that time the proportion required to be paid by each was about fair and equitable. Since that time the population of Washington has greatly increased. They have all increased, in fact; but Washington has increased in population and wealth to a greater extent than either Georgetown or the District outside of the two cities. According to the census of 1860, there were 75,180 people in the entire District of Columbia, of whom 8,733 were in Georgetown, 5,225 were in the county, and 61,122 in Washington.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 46.

The Committee on the District of Columbia have taken the census of 1850 as a basis for the distribution of the expenses between the two cities and the county. That would not be exactly fair to-day, perhaps, toward the county and the city of Georgetown. Perhaps Washington has increased during the last three years in a much greater proportion in wealth and population than Georgetown and the District; but there was no other data that we could assume upon which to reach any very reasonable conclusion.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that in this bill we have inserted the words, "and the jail of said county." The bill, as it now stands, would not require the levy court, or the county, or either of the cities to contribute at all toward the expense of supporting the jail; but the words were inserted there in contemplation of some other legislation of Congress by which a portion at any rate of the expenses of supporting the jail might be thrown upon the county. If Congress does not see fit hereafter to provide by law that the jail shall be taken care of by the county, as it does provide in all the Territories of the United States, which hold very much the same relation to the General Government that the District of Columbia holds to the General Government, then this clause in relation to the jail will be wholly inoperative; but if it shall be deemed best hereafter to provide that the District shall contribute toward the expenses of the jail, then this law will stand, and the distribution between the two cities and the county will be as provided in this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the chairman of the committee if the expenses of maintaining the jail are not now paid by the United States out of the Treasury?

Mr. GRIMES. They are.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I supposed; and I ask him to state what, if he recollects, is the amount of maintaining the jail? My impression is that it is very heavy, and it is particularly heavy at this time. The population of Washington, although it has really increased to a very great extent, has nominally increased to a very much greater extent, and consists of a floating population brought here by the peculiar condition of the country; and very many of the offenses, perhaps most of the offenses that are committed, are committed by that class of people who are necessarily brought to a place such as Washington is at this time. It seems very hard to me that the whole expense of maintaining the jail, or the proportion stated here, should be thrown upon the city of Washington.

I am not sure that I understood the chairman, whether he intended to say that this law would not operate at once, so as to throw upon the city the burden of supporting the jail, or whether its operation would be dependent upon future legislation on the part of Congress. As I read it, the moment it passes, the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county will be liable to pay the whole expense of maintaining the jail. Now, this city has recently determined upon incurring very heavy expenditures for the pavement of its streets, the making of additional sewers, and the improvement of the existing sewers; all of which will throw on the city a very heavy burden. It seems to me the proper policy, so far as we can do it consistent with justice to the United States, would be rather to increase the inducements for persons to come to the city and make it their permanent residence. That is not done if you heap upon them the expense of maintaining a jail, which for the most part becomes necessary and becomes expensive, not because the city of Washington is here, or is the city of Washington, and has a population of its own, but because, being the seat of government, there are a great many people from all the States of the Union, and from foreign nations, who are assembled here, and who are very apt to increase, and certainly have very much increased, the expense of maintaining the jail.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland reads this bill and construes it altogether different from the manner in which I read it. There is nothing in the bill which makes it obligatory on either of the cities or the county to support the jail. It merely says, "such expenses as may be incurred;" that is, such expenses as may be incurred by them voluntarily if they see fit to do it, or by some act of Congress that may hereafter be passed, shall be distributed in the proportions fixed and established by this bill.

I am unable to answer the question of the Senator as to the expenses of the jail. I do not know anybody who can answer it except the First Comptroller, and I do not know that he can. I know they are very heavy; but I am very well satisfied they would not be one fourth of what they are if the jail was under the control of some local authority, and not under the control of the United States Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why?

Mr. GRIMES. In the first place, we pay to all the officers connected with that jail fees twice as large as are paid by the county and by the city for services of a similar or very similar character, and to men of the same grade of capacity for the performance of such duties. We pay twice as much for the support of the persons in the jail, under some extraordinary construction that has been given on the subject of rations to these prisoners, than has been given heretofore. The commutation for rations to the prisoners now in the jail is thirty-six cents, although a year ago it was in testimony before the Committee on the District of Columbia that those rations could be furnished for eight or nine cents, if I remember aright. If we had the corporations of Georgetown and Washington, or the officers of the levy court, to look after that jail, they would see to it that there was not such an extraordinary amount of money squandered as is being squandered now. There is no control over the jail by Congress which appropriates this money.

There is no analogy in the history of the Territories or in the Government for the United States Government paying the expenses of jails. I have lived in my lifetime in three Territories. A Territory holds very much the same relation to the Federal Government that this District does. There never was such a case heard of as the Federal Government paying the expenses of a jail in a Territory. But still, as I said before, this bill does not contemplate producing any change in regard to the expenses of the jail. I think the bill will not admit of any such construction as the Senator from Maryland gives to it. It contemplates, however, that if they shall voluntarily take any action on the subject, the expense shall be distributed in the proportion fixed by this bill; or, if we shall follow it up by some subsequent legislation, and declare that hereafter the District of Columbia shall be burdened with the expenses of the jail, then that those expenses shall be distributed among the constituent parts composing the District in the ratio fixed by this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think I have been mistaken as to the meaning of the bill as it stands, if it should become a law. The law as it now stands requires the whole expense of the jail to be defrayed by the United States. As the District is entirely within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of Congress, Congress of course have a right to change it. There is no doubt about that;

and the only question is, whether if this bill passes as it now stands on our table, the law in that respect will not be changed.

The bill assumes of course that there are certain expenses to be met for the support of the orphans' court, the expenses of the levy court, and the expenses of the jail, and says that those expenses in the aggregate, orphans' court, levy court, and jail shall be paid. Shall, when? Shall under this law. When? When the law passes, I have no doubt, because the chairman of the committee says so, that it was not the purpose of the committee or his own purpose in drafting the bill; but as I read it, it will become at once the duty of these three localities, Georgetown, Washington, and the county, to pay the whole amount of the expense.

The chairman admits that the expense would be a pretty considerable item. He justifies the proposition to throw the whole on this city and Georgetown and the county, on the ground that if the matter were in their hands the expense would not be as great as it is. Whose fault is it that the expenses are so great as the gentleman states? It is not the fault of this city, nor of Georgetown, nor of the county; it is the fault of Congress; it is the fault of the committee, if there be any fault. I ask the honorable chairman of the committee and my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who have these matters in charge, why cannot you by legislation just as well as this city or Georgetown guard against that unnecessary expense? I see no difficulty about it, not the slightest.

It is true, I dare say, that the expenses are a great deal heavier than they should be. The chairman says you pay your jailer and superintendent and different officers a great deal more than they ought to be paid. You can get rid of that by changing the law in that particular. It is said that the amount allowed for rations is much larger than it should be. You can get clear of that just as well as the city can, and you have the same inducement the city has; that is to say, the inducement of saving money. The expenses will be enormous or very heavy, no matter what may be the salaries paid to these officers, or what may be the amount of rations furnished to the prisoners; but that does not justify throwing the whole expense on these three localities, as a very large portion of the expense is caused by the Government itself, not directly but incidentally.

Now, there is a difference, as it seems to me, and upon that difference Congress has acted up to the present time, between the condition of this city and any other Territory. In the other Territories the whole is strictly local; all the population there belongs strictly to that locality. They go there to reside. They are governed by their own territorial legislation. Their territorial Legislatures have entire jurisdiction over the people; but here the city has no jurisdiction at all except so far as you give it to them.

Mr. GRIMES. We propose to give it to them.

Mr. JOHNSON. You do not give them the power of legislation in order to keep down expenses by keeping away criminals.

Mr. GRIMES. We propose to follow that up hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON. In what way? That cannot be done. There are some things that cannot be done, and that is one of those things. You cannot prevent people from coming to the District as long as we remain a free people. They will come, and in the present condition of things they come in hordes, and where such a mass come into the city, in the nature of things, as long as men are men, there will be a great many men who will soon find their way into the jail.

It is nothing new for the United States to pay the expenses of enforcing its criminal law. The expense of maintaining every man who is convicted here or in the States of an offense under the laws and is sent to the penitentiary, in that penitentiary is borne by the Government; and why? Because he is an offender as against the laws of the United States, and the expense of maintaining the laws of the United States ought to devolve upon Congress. The laws of the United States are as much in force here as they are in the States. The only difference between the two is that here they are more extensive than they are in the States. The whole here, local and general, is with Congress; but the principle is the same. If it is right that the United States should support its own criminal system in the States out of its own Treasury, it is equally right, as it seems to me, that it should support its own criminal system here out of the Treasury. But whether that be true or not in general, one thing seems to be very obvious, and I submit it to the chairman, whether it would not be better to let the bill lie on the table for a while at least, in order that we may frame some provision by which these localities shall not be required to pay the whole expense.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think they pay any. That is the difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. JOHNSON. But I assume now that I am right; that if this bill passes, they will at once be compelled to pay the whole expense. But suppose it is not so. The chairman says he proposes to change it so as to make the law operative. How is that to be done? Merely by saying that these localities shall pay the expenses, and when the law is changed according to his mode of providing for the expenses that will then be incurred, it does not saddle the United States with any portion of the expense. I submit, therefore, to my friend, the chairman of the committee, that perhaps he had better let the bill lie for a moment until we can have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment—the amendment reported by the committee, which is open to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. My amendment is to amend that amendment by inserting after the words "and the jail of said county," in the ninth line, the words "when hereafter imposed by law."

I understand the committee did not intend to impose the expense of the jail at present by this bill upon the county; but the bill contemplates an imposition of the expenses in part upon the county by subsequent legislation. The Senator from Maryland thinks that the bill does presently impose the expense upon the county. To obviate that difficulty this amendment is proposed, leaving to future legislation to determine whether any portion of the expenses shall be imposed upon the county. If they are, then of course this bill fixes the ratio; and that is all. With that explanation, I do not suppose it is objectionable.

Mr. JOHNSON. The proposed amendment relieves the bill itself of one of the objections which I stated, or rather makes the bill accomplish what the chairman of the committee says was the object of the committee in drafting the bill, makes it prospective; but it does not remove the other objection. The other objection was that it is not right, as I think, that the cities and county should pay the whole of the expense of the jail. This amendment only provides that when the expense is laid on them it is to be paid in the proportion there stated, whatever you may impose. You do not say the United States shall pay any part of it. Whatever may be imposed in the future, the whole of it is to be paid by these three localities.

Mr. MORRILL. In that proportion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, the proportions are in fifteenths, and you have got all the fifteenths named here, and the city of Washington must pay so many fifteenths.

Mr. MORRILL. We may say that the United States shall pay one half and the county one half of those proportions.

Mr. JOHNSON. But you do not say that. At least I do not understand it so. I submit it to the friends of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. You will have to look at it sharper.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I think this is sharp on the locality. The bill, as proposed to be amended, will say, if we pass it in that form:

That from and after the passage of this act, the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, the corporate authorities of the city of Georgetown, and the county authorities of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, shall contribute to the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington, incurred on account of the orphans' court, the office of coroner, and the jail of said county, in the following proportions, to wit: the city of Washington twelve fifteenths, the city of Georgetown two fifteenths, and the county of Washington one fifteenth of said expenses.

That, according to my calculation, is fifteen fifteenths. Now, what is the United States to pay? If the Senate will consent to let the bill lie on the table for a short time we can easily draft an amendment to free it from the difficulties I have stated. I have no objection to the bill at all, except that I wish to guard this city and Georgetown against what I think would be a very burdensome taxation. If the friends of the bill think that the United States should pay a portion of it, then they should provide what portion the United States is to pay in this bill, instead of saying that the whole fifteen fifteenths is to be paid by these three corporations.

Mr. MORRILL. If I understand the bill, I do not think it is obnoxious to the objection taken by the Senator from Maryland. The committee did not intend by this bill to impose any expense on the county. They considered the question of imposing a portion of the expenses of this jail hereafter on the county, but did not provide for it by this bill, but intended to provide for it by another bill. They say, therefore, that whatever expenses shall be imposed by law on the county in regard to the expenses of this jail, that portion shall be distributed among the cities of Georgetown and Washington and the county in the proportions named. Suppose that Congress should say by a subsequent act that one half the expenses of this jail shall be borne by the cities of Georgetown and Washington and the county. Then it would follow that the rates are simply fixed by this bill; and that is all. The objection that the Senator takes is, that the fifteen fifteenths mentioned in this bill would necessarily make the whole of the expense. That is true; but that proportion only applies to the sum which by subsequent legislation we shall fix for the cities and the county to pay. For that reason I think the objection is not well taken.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is very difficult for a Senator coming from a distant State to understand the laws of this District, and especially to understand the measures coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia, he not being a member of that committee, and not having heard the discussion on the subject, and the reasons for the proposed statute.

If the view submitted by the Senator who last spoke be the correct one, if that be the correct construction of this bill in its present frame, it does not require these three corporations, the two cities and the county, to pay fifteen fifteenths, but only such proportion of the expenses as may hereafter be levied for the purposes specified by the bill, to be settled in some statute or act of Congress hereafter. Then I suggest whether, if the information I have received be true, the proportions of the amount of the expenses of this levy court, on account of the orphan court, the coroner, and the jail, hereafter to be levied, are proper and right.

I understood the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia to say that heretofore the practice had been to assess these taxes according to population. My information is that they have been assessed according to area, and not according to population; and there is some propriety in that. This city is the Federal capital, and is subject to all the burdens which arise from its peculiar character as well as the advantages which it also derives from being the capital of the nation. It has been the practice heretofore, as I understand, to levy these duties according to the area of territory, and not according to the population, in order to equalize the burden, and place it upon those who are better able to pay it, and who in justice ought to pay this expense.

I understand that the proportion heretofore has been one half upon the county and one half upon the cities. I understand that the levy court which is to be authorized by this act to incur these expenses is constituted in the proportion of five from the county to three from the city of Washington, and one or two from the city of Georgetown. All the public officers who have charge of these matters of city and county expenses are appointed in that proportion with a view to represent their respective interests properly, and to have their respective weight and influence in those boards. I have always understood that taxation and representation should go together, and have heretofore gone together; and yet in the bill before us we have a proposition to assess twelve fifteenths of the taxes on the city of Washington, and three fifteenths on the county of Washington and the city of Georgetown, although you give them at least five out of the nine who compose the levy court to incur these expenses.

It was with a view to state these facts that I rose. I do not profess to be at all familiar with the statutes heretofore on this subject, or to have had an opportunity to look into and fully understand the extent and drift of the proposed amendment coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia; but still it seems to me there is an impropriety in changing the whole practice and the whole system which has obtained heretofore in relation to these questions and the raising of these taxes. Therefore, as at present informed, I shall be opposed to the amendment proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRIMES. This is the first time that I have ever heard that the original apportionment was made between the cities of Georgetown and Washington and the county according to their geographical area. Since the Senator has been speaking, I have been in conversation with the mayor of Georgetown, who, I believe, is one of the oldest inhabitants around here, and he tells me the Senator from New Jersey is mistaken about that, and it was originally made, as I had supposed, according to population in these respective localities. But if it had been made according to geographical area, certainly it is time we should change it, and make it, as it ought to be, on population.

What are these expenses to be incurred for? For the orphans' court? Would it be fair to tax five thousand people in the county outside of these cities one half as much as we tax the people here in the city of Washington, where there is such an accumulation of population and of wealth? That is the proportion as it now stands. Would it be fair to tax the eight thousand people in the city of Georgetown one half as much as you tax the sixty or seventy thousand people in this city? Have they all as much business to be transacted in the orphans' court, or half as much business to be transacted in the orphans' court, as the people of this city? Have they got one half as much as the people of this city to be adjudicated upon? Have they got one half as much of the ability to pay fees as the people in this city have? And for whose benefit is it that the coroner performs his duties? Is he called to perform duties outside the city of Washington to one half the extent that he is within the city of Washington?

As I said before, when the apportionment was originally made it was comparatively fair. Our predecessors thought they established it upon a correct and just basis, because at that time the city of Georgetown was nearly one half or quite one half as large as Washington in population, and there were about one half as many people in the District outside of both cities as there are now; and hence they declared that each of the two corporations, the county and Georgetown, should pay one quarter each, while this city should pay one half. Now, there has been such an increase of population and wealth here that Washington is intrinsically worth twelve fifteenths and has population twelve fifteenths as compared with Georgetown, and the county two fifteenths and one fifteenth. Even if it be true, as the Senator from New Jersey suggests, that the original basis was geographical extent, I apprehend it is time we should change that rule and establish population as the basis.

Now let me say one word further, and I believe it is all I shall have to say on this subject. It was never the intention of the Committee on the District of Columbia to require by this bill that the cities or any of these corporations should bear any portion of these jail expenses. The sole purpose of inserting the words "and the jail of said county" in this bill was to prevent the necessity of an appeal to Congress at every session for a reapportionment of the expenses between these respective corporations.

Some gentlemen may suppose it is a mere matter of amusement to be on the Committee on the District of Columbia, where you have one hundred thousand people about you, each one of them having a different interest, each one of them trying to promote his own interests, and some of them perhaps not over-anxious that the interests of other people should be promoted.

We sought to get rid of this kind of importunity that we knew would be constantly addressed to us at every session of Congress in regard to this reapportionment of the expenses of the cities and county. We merely inserted the words in relation to the jail in order to prevent the necessity, whenever Congress, if it should see fit hereafter to require that the cities and county in the District should pay a portion of the jail expenses, of our going into a mathematical calculation or to have a new census taken, or anything of that kind, to determine the proportion of expense that should be borne by each. The amendment of the Senator from Maine obviates to my mind all the objection that has been taken by the Senator from Maryland.

The Senator from Maryland asks us to let the bill lie on the table until an amendment can be drawn which will require the county of Washington to pay only one half. I do not ask the county of Washington to pay anything. I am not in favor and am not prepared to vote to impose one cent of taxation on the county of Washington today in connection with this jail; and I do not know that I shall be ready to do so this Congress. There is, therefore, no necessity for laying the bill on the table for that purpose. It may be that some arrangement may be hit upon hereafter between the representatives of the Government in this Chamber and the authorities of Washington, which will be agreeable to all, by which a portion of this expense shall be thrown upon the city, and let the city have control of the jail, as I think it or some municipal authority should have. I think it would be for the benefit of us all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Move to strike out the jail.

Mr. GRIMES. I have just said I only put it in there for the purpose of preventing these importunities coming to us.

Mr. JOHNSON. If those words were left in, the apprehension I had was that this city, Georgetown, and the county would be compelled to pay the whole expense of the jail. I have no objection to the bill as explained by the chairman and by his associate on the committee, the Senator from Maine. It is intended, I understand, to provide at once, in order to guard against importunity and difficulty in the future, that whatever may be the expense, however incurred and upon whomsoever they may be levied, they shall be borne in the proportions here stated. As I understand the chairman he does not propose by this bill to make the District pay any portion of the expenses now being incurred to support the jail.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. That being the case, I do not see why he has put the jail in at all. Let us strike that out, and when we come to provide hereafter by another bill for the manner in which the expense of the jail can be supported, we can provide that it shall be supported by these cities in the proportion of a half or a third or whatever it may be, and have no importunity about it.

Mr. GRIMES. Then we shall have this old question of fixing the rates between the respective proportions over again.

Mr. JOHNSON. There will be no difficulty about that, because, according to the Senator's view, this bill would not fix the rates unless we meant to throw the whole burden on the District.

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose we pass a law hereafter that one half of all the expenses of the jail shall be borne by the levy court and one half by us.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then you would have to state it in the proposition stated in this bill. That you can do just as well if you leave the jail out of this bill altogether. It does not answer any purpose that I see, and if the Senator has no objection I will move to strike out all relating to the jail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the committee. The motion to strike out will be in order when the amendment of the committee is perfected.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Maryland propose to move to strike out the words "and the jail of said county?"

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggested to the chairman of the committee that perhaps a difficulty that may exist and will exist since this amendment is adopted will be obviated by striking out the word "jail." However, I will not move the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended so as to read, A bill to apportion the expenses of the levy court in the county of Washington upon the basis of population.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 42) to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States and other countries to act within the District of Columbia; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863; and

A bill (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, to submit a report, which I ask to have considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. POWELL. Has the report been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the report be printed. This is a very important question, which we ought to understand. I should like to see what legislation was done in the committee of conference about it.

Mr. WILSON. It is a matter of importance to get this bill through as soon as possible, and I do not think it is necessary to print the report. It is very plain, and it will be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not question what the Senator says about the importance attached to this matter, but it is certainly quite as important that we should understand what is done, and know that it is done as near right as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has the right to submit his motion. It is in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, sir, I will move that the report of the conference committee, which I see is very voluminous, be printed; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. Before the vote is taken I will suggest that this report is very long and on a very important subject, and I think it ought to be printed. It can be printed and laid on our tables by to-morrow morning, and then when we have it before us we can take it up and consider it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is but reasonable.

Mr. GRIMES. I was a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate, and I will state to Senators that there is not any material change, except in two particulars, in the bill now proposed by the committee, from the Senate bill as it passed here; and any gentleman can comprehend them on the mere reading of the sections. In the House of Representatives a substitute was adopted for our bill, and that substitute only differed from the Senate bill by the use of two or three words in each section, or perhaps two or three words in half a dozen places in each section. For instance, the words "election precinct," to cover the case in the State of Maryland, runs through half a dozen sections, and is incorporated into each section in half a dozen places; and that swells the report of the conference committee, I suppose, two or three pages.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the Senator if the report contains any reasoning why we should concur or non-concur in the amendments? Is it a reasoning report, or only a mere statement of the facts?

Mr. GRIMES. It is merely showing where the provisions of the Senate bill and where the provisions of the House bill are adopted. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is ready to explain it, I apprehend, when it is called up.

Mr. POWELL. The fact that words are inserted in the text is the very reason why this report should be printed. Let us have it all before us, and then we can readily understand the meaning that will be given by the change of those two or three words. It is a matter of very grave importance. The printing of this report will result in very little, if any, delay. I have no doubt it will expedite action upon it to have this report printed and let us all see what we are doing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope this report will be printed. I do not like to vote on so important a question as this under circumstances in which I am not able to know exactly what I am voting for or against. We print bills of ordinary importance and interest before we are called upon to vote on them; and although I would not question a single word, as a matter of fact, that the Senator from Iowa says, still we are not expected to cast votes on what Senators may say is contained in a bill. We ought to have an opportunity of reading it before we are called upon to vote on a question of such importance as this. It will not delay it long.

Mr. WILSON. I admit the importance of the bill; but we are approaching the 1st of March, and it is of great importance that the bill shall be passed as soon as possible. The Senate passed a bill of twenty-eight sections. That bill went to the House of Representatives. The House struck out four of these sections, and added three of their own, and made more or less modifications in twenty-three sections of the Senate bill, which they moved as an amendment to the bill itself. Their amendments were generally improvements, and have been concurred in in the Senate bill. The bill as reported back is substantially the bill passed by the Senate with these slight modifications. There are one or two sections of the bill—one especially, the last section, I think, of the House bill—in which there have been modifications by the committee; but they are very plain, and can be comprehended at once. I do not think there will be any difficulty in understanding them. I think we had better have the report of the committee read and acted upon. I do not see the necessity of printing it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator whether the amendments adopted by the House of Representatives have ever been printed in this body?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. The bill, as amended by the House of Representatives, came up here for consideration, and was printed and laid on our tables.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. WILSON. We had the printed bills before us in the conference committee. Each member had a copy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose that was the House print. I have not seen any Senate print. There may have been one, though I think not. I will ask the Chair about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then the part I desire printed now is the report of the committee of conference.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Catlett, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Comess, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report of the committee of conference. After reading it at some length he was interrupted by

Mr. WILKINSON. I voted against the printing of that report before, and I now wish to make a motion to reconsider that vote. I think it is absolutely necessary that that report should be printed, that we may know what it is. If certain features are in that bill which I am told are in it, I shall vote against it; but I want to know what the provisions of the bill are.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to order the report of the committee of conference to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator that all the changes in the bill are contained in two sections. We have here the printed bill, and the sections are here with our modifications. We have modified the section inserted by the House of Representatives for enrolling and drafting colored persons, and the Senator will see when we come to it what that modification is.

The Senate provided that the commutation money should be $400, and that the name of the person paying commutation money should go back into the box. The House of Representatives reduced that sum to $300, and required the name of the drafted person paying commutation to be added to the list, making him again liable only after everybody else had been drafted. That seemed to be a bounty for the payment of money and against the obtaining of soldiers. The committee of conference therefore consented to the House amendment reducing the sum from $400 to $300, but provided that that should relieve the person only for one year, instead of providing that he should go back to the foot of the list. We thought that would put him on an equality with the man who procures a substitute, for he is not discharged if his substitute becomes liable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend as a Senator to vote without understanding what I vote for or against on an important measure if I can help it; and I do not think it is the right of a majority to ask that of us. While it is not usual to print reports from committees of conference, because they generally relate to but one or two things and are very simple, relating to mere questions of disagreement between the two bodies, yet when we have a report so voluminous as this, reaching to almost every section of the bill, and when a Senator says to the majority that upon the reading of the report he is not sufficiently informed to give that vote he desires to give upon it, it seems to me but a reasonable thing that one day should be given to the printing of the report, that we may vote knowing what we are voting for or against. I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can secure the passage of his bill at an earlier hour by allowing the report to be printed than by denying it. It is but a fair thing that is asked, and I think it ought to be cheerfully conceded.

Mr. CONNESS. The proposition made by the Senator from Indiana appears fair on the face of it; but he can scarcely fail to see that it is not only unusual but rather out of the line of precedents. These conference committees in legislative bodies are the means of reconciling constantly accruing differences between the two Houses; and if a demand to print their reports when made should be acceded to as a matter of courtesy, or even of right, the Senator can hardly fail to see how important legislation might be delayed and finally lost. I have never heard of such a course in legislation.

If it were necessary in order that a Senator might understand the points at issue before he voted upon them, there would be some reason for asking a change of the course which is not only usual, but universally followed. Certainly the measure now under consideration has been sufficiently understood and debated by the press of the country and in both Houses of Congress until almost every point of it is comprehended by every person in the land. The differences existing between the two Houses of Congress upon it have been accommodated by this committee of conference, and to ask for delay before a vote can be taken on the question of concurring or non-concurring seems to me rather an extraordinary demand. It would be the right of the Senator, and very properly, it appears to me, to call for such a division of the question as to enable the Senate to vote upon the separate propositions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That cannot be done. The report must be taken as a whole.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well. Then it presents no difficulty to my mind; nor do I see anything in this case that should call for a change from the precedent that is a necessity in legislation, and that has been universally followed.

Mr. WILKINSON. If it were the close of the session the remarks of the Senator from California would be applicable and pertinent.

Mr. GRIMES. It is pretty near the 1st of March, though.

Mr. WILKINSON. But I do not see the necessity of urging the Senate to a vote to-day when this motion, if it prevails, will not detain the bill more than a day. It will be printed to-morrow. It is my opinion, with the feeling manifested by some gentlemen on this floor, that if this matter is urged to a vote to-night, no time will be gained at all; for I do not believe Senators can get a vote upon it. I think, therefore, it had better be printed.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me to be an unusual thing to print a report of this character, and I thought and still think it of great importance to get through with this bill to-day. But Senators speak with some earnestness, not to say feeling in the matter, and I certainly would not like to adopt an illiberal policy of action here toward anybody. From what has been said, and the earnest manner in which it has been said, I suppose we can hardly hope to get the bill through much sooner by pressing it than by yielding to the wishes of Senators. I will yield, therefore, to allow the report to be printed, with the understanding that we shall have it to-morrow morning, and shall take the vote upon it then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the Senate refused to order the report to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the motion to print the report.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The subject will therefore be postponed until to-morrow; and the Senate will return to the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in primary schools throughout the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Mr. GRIMES. Without reading the original bill, I suggest that the Senate proceed to consider the amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) Unless some Senator calls for the reading of the original bill the amendment reported by the committee in lieu of the original bill will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the school districts in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, shall be and remain as now laid down according to law, subject to revision and alteration by the levy court of said county, and that the school commissioners now in office shall be and remain so until others are appointed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the levy court shall annually, on the first Monday in May, appoint one person from each school district as a commissioner of primary schools, of which appointment the clerk of the levy court shall immediately notify the person so appointed; and whenever a vacancy shall occur in the board of said commissioners, the levy court, as soon as may be thereafter, shall fill the same, and all appointments made by or resolutions of said court concerning said commissioners shall be forthwith communicated by the clerk of said court to the clerk of the said board of commissioners; and each of said commissioners shall hold the office until a successor is appointed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That each of the said commissioners before he enters upon the execution of his office, and within fifteen days after notice of his appointment, shall take and subscribe before some justice of the peace of said county the following oath: "I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I will in all things, to the best of my knowledge and ability, well and truly execute the trust reposed in me as commissioner of primary schools for the county of Washington, District of Columbia, without prejudice and according to law;" and every justice of the peace, before whom such oath shall be taken, shall certify the same in writing, and within eight days thereafter transmit or deliver said certificate to the clerk of the levy court for record.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners and their successors shall be a corporation, under the name and style of "the board of commissioners of primary schools of Washington county, District of Columbia," with power to sue and be sued, and to take and hold, in fee simple or otherwise, any estate, real or personal, not prohibited by law, which may be given to or purchased by the said board for primary school purposes, and may alien and sell the same when, in the opinion of the levy court, it will be for the advantage of the said primary schools so to do; and all money in hand, after defraying the whole expenses of the several school districts at the end of each school year, shall be invested in some safe stock in the name of said corporation, and in their corporate name may prosecute and maintain actions for injuries done to the grounds, houses, furniture, or other property in their possession.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners shall make and keep a record of all its official acts, and a strict and particular account of all moneys directed to be paid, a statement of which, with the vouchers relating thereto, as well as the record of the levy court of said county; and said record, or a copy thereof, certified to be correct by any one of said commissioners, testified by the signature of the clerk of said board, shall be evidence of their acts in all proceedings, judicial or otherwise; and the said board shall appoint a capable person as their clerk, (who may be one of their own members, or otherwise,) prescribe his duties, and allow him a reasonable compensation for his services.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners shall hold stated meetings in January, April, July, and October of each and every year, at such times and places as they may appoint, and at such other meetings as circumstances may require; but if less than four members attend at any one meeting no business shall be done, except to adjourn to a future day; and at the stated meetings in April and October the treasurer of the school funds and the collector of taxes shall render in writing a full statement of their accounts respectively for the next preceding half year.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the levy court of said county shall annually, on or before the first Monday in April, furnish to the said board of commissioners alphabetical lists of the owners of property in each school district, according to the last county assessment, and a statement of the total amount of property assessed to each owner, exhibiting the school tax thereon according to the last levy made by the levy court for school purposes.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners shall have power annually (or as a vacancy may occur) to appoint one person in each school district as trustee of that district, who, with the commissioner of such district, shall have charge of the local concerns of the schools therein, and act in concert with the board of commissioners in carrying out all the rules and regulations ordained by the said board, and together may permit the school-house or houses in their district to be used for public worship, or for other purposes of general benefit to the residents of the district.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners shall have power, and it shall be their duty—

First. To receive and disburse any fund which may be provided for the purchase of sites and the erection and support of primary schools in said county and district.

Second. To regulate the number of children to be taught in each of said schools, and the price of their tuition.

Third. To select such teachers as are competent, and to fix their salaries and terms of service.

Fourth. To suspend or expel from any school, with the advice of the commissioners and trustees of the district, any pupil who will not submit to the reasonable and ordinary rules of order and discipline therein.

Fifth. To regulate and control the purchase and distribution of books, stationery, and other things necessary for the use of said schools, and generally to prescribe rules and regulations for the management, good government, and well ordering of said schools.

Sixth. To report to the levy court, at the close of each school year, the amount of all expenditures on account of schools in the several districts during the previous school year, and the manner in which the same shall have been expended, specifying what portion and amount thereof has been expended for the services of teachers, and also shall particularly set forth the number of pupils taught, and their average attendance and progress, and such other statistics as the levy court may require.

Seventh. To select, purchase, or otherwise procure suitable sites for school houses in each district, adopt plans, and cause to be built, kept in repair, and furnished, such school-houses with necessary fuel, books, stationery, and appendages, and to defray the necessary or contingent expenses of the board: Provided, That the pay of teachers shall always have preference.

Eighth. Each commissioner shall be entitled to receive four dollars per day for every day he shall attend a meeting of the board and not absent himself without permission, and four dollars per day for every day he shall serve on a committee, and all disbursements shall be made through the treasurer of the school fund, on the draft of the president and clerk of said board, drawn by order of the said board.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of supporting said schools and providing suitable sites, houses, and equipments therefor, the levy court shall annually, on the first Monday in March, impose and levy a school tax not exceeding one fourth of one per cent. on all the assessed property of said county without the limits of Washington and Georgetown owned by white persons; which tax shall be due at the same time, and be collected by the county collector in the same manner, and under the same regulations and restrictions, as are prescribed by law in relation to the collection of the county taxes, and which are hereby made applicable to the collection of the school tax imposed by this act, and when collected shall be paid to the treasurer of the school fund, and the treasurer of the levy court is hereby constituted treasurer of the school fund; and the said treasurer and collector, each, shall qualify by making oath or affirmation faithfully to discharge the duties required of him, and they shall each give bond to the said board of commissioners, with two sufficient sureties, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties required of each of them by this act, in a sum to be fixed by the levy court; which bonds, being approved by the said board of commissioners, shall be filed with the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who is hereby required to file the same, and a copy of either of said bonds, under seal of said court, shall be sufficient evidence of the making thereof; and the said treasurer shall be paid such compensation for his services as the said board of commissioners may allow, and the said collector the same fees as are allowed by the said levy court for collecting the county tax.

Sec. 11. And he it further enacted, That in addition to the taxes hereby imposed, there shall be paid to "the board of commissioners of primary schools of Washington county, District of Columbia," by the marshal of the District of Columbia, and the justices of the peace for the county of Washington, District of Columbia, one half part of all the moneys now in their hands for fines, penalties, and forfeitures accruing to the United States for violations of law; and it shall be the duty of said marshal and justices of the peace to pay over every three months, from and after the passage of this act, one half part of all the moneys coming into their hands, as aforesaid, to the said board of commissioners of primary schools, for the use of said primary schools, any law to the contrary notwithstanding, and failing so to do shall be liable to the penalty imposed by the second section of the act of Congress approved July 12, 1853, and the whole amount standing to the credit of the school fund when the said levy is to be made shall form a basis to ascertain the amount of tax necessary to meet the current expenses of the school year, which amount shall be levied as aforesaid, and no more.

Sec. 12. And he it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners shall apportion the school fund among the several school districts, giving to each one seventh of the whole amount of school taxes collected and then in hand, after deducting the contingent expenses of the board, and one seventh of all other funds paid in, until a sufficient amount shall be in hand to purchase a site and erect and furnish a school-house in each district, the cost of which not to exceed $1,500, (unless by private subscription,) then according to the number of children in each district attending school: Provided, That not more than the actual expenses of each district shall be paid: And provided further, That more than one school may be established in any one district if the funds are procured.

Sec. 13. And he it further enacted, That in case the said commissioners should not be able to purchase suitable sites for the erection of school-houses, they shall have power to condemn and value a suitable site or sites for that purpose, not exceeding one acre of land in each site, by giving ten days' notice, in writing, to the proprietors thereof, and filing with the clerk of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, for inspection, a certificate describing such lands, with the value assessed thereon, signed by the president and clerk of said board of commissioners, which shall be sufficient notice to the proprietors of such land that the said board of commissioners are ready to pay the amount of damages so assessed; and if within thirty days from the filing of said certificate the proprietors of such land shall not appeal from the decision of said commissioners, by written notice left with the said clerk of the levy court, the amount so assessed shall be paid to the proprietors, and the title to such land and premises shall pass to and be vested in "the board of commissioners of primary schools of Washington county, District of Columbia," and the said certificate shall be recorded in the land records of Washington county, District of Columbia, and shall be final; but if the proprietors of such land and premises shall, within the said thirty days, notify the said commissioners, in writing, left with the clerk of the levy court, of their dissent from the valuation of such land as made by the said commissioners, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, by their president and clerk, to issue their warrant to the marshal of the District of Columbia, commanding him to summon a jury of five freeholders, not interested in the matter, to appear on a day to be appointed by the said commissioners, on the premises, and after having each taken an oath (which the marshal or any one of said commissioners is authorized to administer) that he will, without favor or prejudice, assess the damages sustained by the proprietor of said land by reason of the condemnation of said land by the said commissioners, the jury so qualified shall proceed to value and assess the damages accordingly; and if the amount assessed by the said jury shall not be greater than the amount assessed by the said commissioners, the whole costs of the said appeal shall be chargeable to the appellant, be paid by the said commissioners, and deducted from the cost of the land in settlement thereof; otherwise the said board of commissioners shall pay the expenses incurred by reason of such appeal, the marshal's and jurors' fees to be computed according to the act of Congress approved March 3, 1853, defining the powers and duties of the levy court.

Sec. 14. And he it further enacted, That the said jury, immediately after they shall have completed their inquest and assessed the damages, shall make out a written verdict, setting forth a full and distinct description of the land and premises and the valuation or damages assessed therefor, which shall be signed by them, or a majority of them, and, attested by the marshal, shall be immediately returned to the clerk of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, and shall be final; and the said damages having been paid, or offered to be paid, to the said proprietors, the title to such land shall pass to and be vested in "the board of commissioners of primary schools of Washington county, District of Columbia," and the verdict of the jury shall be recorded in the land records of Washington county, District of Columbia: Provided, That it shall be optional with the said commissioners to abide by said verdict, and occupy the said land or abandon it without being subject to damages therefor.

Sec. 15. And he it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to locate any site for a school-house in any orchard or garden, nor within three hundred yards of any dwelling-house, without the consent of the proprietor of such dwelling-house; and in order to obtain such consent or refusal, thirty days' notice shall be given to said proprietor by the said commissioners, notifying such proprietor of their intention; and if within thirty days no answer is returned to said commissioners by said proprietor, it shall be taken for consent, and the said commissioners may proceed to erect their school-house without let or hindrance.

Sec. 16. And he it further enacted, That if the treasurer or collector, having any school funds in his hands, or neglecting or refusing to obtain such funds as by law authorized and directed, shall refuse to pay for two weeks any order of the said commissioners drawn in conformity with the requisitions of this act, such treasurer or collector shall be liable, on proof before any court of justice or justice of the peace having cognizance, and without stay of execution, to pay the full amount of said order and interest thereon, at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, from the first refusal until the day of payment, by way of damages. If any collector appointed or acting under the provisions of this act shall in any case collect more than is due, the person aggrieved shall have his remedy against such collector by suit or warrant, and if he recover he shall have judgment for double the amount improperly and unjustly extorted from him, and costs. The levy court of Washington county shall exercise a general supervision over the proceedings of said commissioners, may examine their books and papers, and shall prosecute for any delinquencies or violations of their duty. It shall not be lawful for a member of the levy court of said county to be a commissioner of primary schools or trustee of any of the school districts, nor for any person to be at the same time commissioner and trustee as aforesaid.

Sec. 17. And he it further enacted, That any white resident of said county shall be privileged to place his or her child or ward at any one of the schools in said county he or she may think proper to select with the consent of the commissioners of both districts.

Sec. 18. And he it further enacted, That the said levy court may, in its discretion, and if it shall be deemed by said court best for the interest and welfare of the colored people residing in said county, levy an annual tax of one eighth of one per cent. on all taxable property in said county outside the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, owned by persons of color, for the purpose of initiating a system of education of colored children in said county, which tax shall be collected in the same manner as the tax named in section ten of this act; and it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to provide suitable and convenient rooms for holding schools for colored children, to employ teachers therefor, and to appropriate the proceeds of said tax to the payment of such teachers, rent of school rooms, and other necessary expenses pertaining to said schools, to exercise a general supervision over them, to establish proper discipline, and endeavor to promote a full, equal, and useful instruction of the colored children in said county. It shall be lawful for such commissioners to impose a tax of not more than fifty cents per month on the parent or guardian of each child attending said schools, to be applied to the payment of the expenses of the school of which said child shall be an attendant, and in the exercise of this power the commissioners may, from time to time, discontinue the payment altogether, or may graduate the tax according to the ability of the child and the wants of the school. And said commissioners are authorized to receive any donations or contributions that may be made for the benefit of said schools by persons disposed to aid in the elevation of the colored population in the District of Columbia, and to apply the same in such manner as in their opinion shall be best calculated to effect the object of the donors, said commissioners being required to account for all funds received by them, and to report to the levy court in accordance with the provisions of section nine of this act.

Sec. 19. And he it further enacted, That this act be, and the same is hereby, declared public and remedial, and shall be construed by all courts of justice according to the equity thereof; and no proceedings of the inhabitants or of the trustees of any school district, or of the commissioners of primary schools, or of any other officer created under the provisions of this act, shall be set aside or adjourned to be void for defect of form, or for any irregularity therein, so that the requisitions of the said act are substantially complied with.

Sec. 20. And he it further enacted, That the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the public instruction of youth in primary schools throughout the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, without the limits of Washington and Georgetown," except the first and third sections, approved May 20, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment in section nine, line ten, after the word "service" to insert the words, "and to dismiss any teacher who may prove to be incompetent or unfit;" so that the clause will read:

Third. To select such teachers as are competent, and to fix their salaries and terms of service, and to dismiss any teacher who may prove to be incompetent or unfit.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move further to amend the amendment in section thirteen, line six, after the word "writing," by inserting in parenthesis "except in cases where notice cannot be served, which cases shall be considered as appealed and treated as appealed cases." This is to cover the case of non-residents or those who cannot be reached.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move further to amend the amendment in section seventeen, line two, by inserting after the word "resident," the words "of one district," and in line three by striking out the words "said county" and inserting the words "any other district," so that it will read:

That any white resident of one district of said county shall be privileged to place his or her child or ward at any of the schools in any other district he or she may think proper to select with the consent of the commissioners of both districts.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill or amendment in one of its sections provides for the compensation to be paid to the trustees or commissioners. It gives them I think four dollars a day, and it authorizes them to sit just as often as they see proper. Judging from the experience I have had in my own State, and witnessing what has been done in some of the other States where we pay daily compensation for services without any limitation on the number of days, they are very likely to sit every day in the year.

Mr. GRIMES. I shall be happy to accept any amendment the Senator can suggest.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only want to make a suggestion to the committee. I do not rise to oppose the bill. In the eastern States, where their school system is as perfect as it can well be made and answers every purpose and has reached a great degree of prosperity, I am not sure whether they pay anything to their trustees or agents. I do not think they pay anything in the State of Maine. It is considered rather a post of honor, as it should be; but if you make it a post of profit I am afraid the honor will be forgotten in the profit, and they will be meeting every day in the year. Now you have four commissioners. They will sit every day in the year, or may sit every day in the year.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there is a limitation as to the length of time they shall sit.

Mr. JOHNSON. No. At least I have gone through the bill as it was read by the Secretary, and I do not see any limitation.

Mr. GRIMES. What section is it?

Mr. MORRILL. The eighth clause of the ninth section, on page 6. There is no other portion of the bill which relates to it, I think.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator from Maryland wish to strike out the whole clause and pay them nothing?

Mr. JOHNSON. That I should prefer, and I move to strike out this clause:

Eighth. Each commissioner shall be entitled to receive four dollars per day for every day he shall attend a meeting of the board, and not absent himself without permission, and four dollars per day for every day he shall serve on a committee; and all disbursements shall be made through the treasurer of the school fund, on the draft of the president and clerk of said board, drawn by order of the said board.

Mr. CLARK. I hardly think it wise to strike out that provision. I do not know but that you may find public-spirited men enough at first to undertake the office; but I think in my own State it is usual to pay the superintending committee for their services in visiting the schools and also in examining the teachers. In my own city we have a superintendent of schools, in addition to the general superintending committee, and we pay him $1,000 salary, and he devotes all his time to the superintending of the schools; but in the towns generally there is a superintending committee of three or four persons, and the members of the committee are paid two or three dollars a day for the time they spend in the schools; and perhaps it is wise to do it here. I do not think anybody will be disposed to spend all his time so as to get the pay, but I have no particular wish about it; I only desire to make the measure efficient.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. Now I move to amend that clause by striking out "four" and inserting "two;" so as to make the pay two dollars a day.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call the attention of the Senate and of the chairman of the committee to the latter proviso in the fourteenth section, on page 11, of the amendment. The proviso says "that it shall be optional with the said commissioners to abide by said verdict and occupy the said land, or abandon it without being subject to damages therefor." The Maryland courts have decided, I think on the authority of some eastern decision, that in a case of inquiry like this the State may, if it thinks proper, after all the expenses have been incurred, abandon the site or whatever is needed, and throw the whole expenses on the proprietor. These cases before juries are rather expensive. The proprietor very often employs counsel, and independent of that he is obliged to examine witnesses, and sometimes a great many of them, and there is quite a bill of costs run-up by the time he gets his verdict; and under this provision, if the authorities were not satisfied with the verdict, they might abandon it at once and the whole expense would be thrown on the owner.

But not only that, which I think is an objection; but then, if the provision is to stand here so as to give the authorities the right to abandon the verdict, there ought to be a limitation of the time within which that could be done. Under this clause as it stands, the proprietor may have this verdict hanging over his estate, preventing him from selling his estate, he not knowing whether it will be taken or will not be taken, because nothing may be done by the commissioners under this proviso, they may not take possession, they may hold it in that way for months and months, and then abandon it. There ought, at least, to be a limitation; and I propose, therefore, if that will effect the object, (and I submit it to the chairman,) to add to the proviso which I have read these words:

Provided, They do it within fifteen days after the verdict shall have been rendered.

Mr. GRIMES. I can see the propriety of that amendment very readily, and concur in the suggestion of the Senator.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the question was stated to be on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a separate vote on the motion made by the Senator from Maryland in relation to the pay of the commissioners, whenever that is proper.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that the Senator from New York asks for a separate vote in regard to the eighth clause in the ninth section. I suppose there is no objection to taking the vote in gross on all the other amendments which have been made in committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) There was but one amendment proposed, being in the form of a substitute for the original bill. To that amendment the Senator from Maryland proposed an amendment, and it was adopted as an amendment to the amendment; and the Senate acting as in Committee of the Whole adopted the amendment as amended. The question now is, in the Senate, will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole? It is now open to amendment, and it is the prerogative of any Senator to move to amend the amendment in any manner before the question is taken on concurrence. No particular feature of it can be excepted as a distinct proposition, because it was not a separate amendment that was moved. The Senator from New York, however, if he pleases, can move to amend this amendment before the question is taken on concurring in it as a whole.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the Chair, then, it is proper to move to strike out this clause in the ninth section which allows compensation to the commissioners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. That I desire to do; and I will state to the Senate that I do it upon the suggestion of a gentleman near me who is quite familiar with the affairs of the District, and who assures me that better men can be obtained to discharge these duties without compensation than if this compensation shall be retained in the bill. I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out the clause allowing compensation.

Mr. CLARK. Upon looking at the bill, I am disposed to concur in the suggestion of the Senator from New York from the fact that the pay is to be taken out of the school fund; you are to take from the scholars the means of doing it. In our country we pay it out of the public funds, and never take it away from the scholars. I would not agree to take it from the scholars and give it to the commissioners. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New York will be agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A bill to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington and District of Columbia.

TRANSFERS FROM THE ARMY TO THE NAVY.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask at this time the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, of which I have not given previous notice. I would not make this request but that the resolution is of great consequence, at least to my part of the country, and indeed to the entirety of the country. It is a resolution prepared in accordance with the judgment of the War Department, the Navy Department, and the President. It relates to the making up without any unnecessary delay of full crews for some of our war ships which the Government contemplate sending to the Pacific coast, for which there is immediate demand, and I hope the Senate will permit the resolution to be passed at once.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce the joint resolution (S. No. 27) relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service, and it was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Provost Marshal General to enlist such persons as may desire to enter into the naval service of the United States, under such directions as may be given by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and these enlistments are to be credited to the appropriate district; but inasmuch as they receive prize money, they are not to be entitled to any bounty. The President, whenever in his judgment the public service may require it, may transfer persons who have been employed in sea service and are now enlisted in the Army from their regiments to the naval service, upon such terms and according to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed; but the number of transfers from any company or regiment is not to be so great as to reduce it below the minimum strength required by the regulations of the military service, and the sums paid to such persons as bounty for entering the military service are to be transferred from the naval recruiting fund to the credit of the proper appropriation for the land service.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply desire to say that this joint resolution is prepared in accordance with the judgment of the Executive, of the Navy Department, and of the War Department. There is now at Hampton Roads a war steamer intended for the coast of California wanting a complement of sixty men. They are desirous of sending three or four more steamers there. There is necessity for them. Provision should be made for immediately filling up their crews so that the ships may sail. This resolution is the product of the Executive and of the War and Navy Departments, and I trust the Senate will pass it now, so that it may go to the House of Representatives without delay. I do not wish to debate it; I trust it will meet the approval of the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the resolution by adding to it the following additional section:

And he it further resolved, That there shall be paid to each enlisted able or ordinary seaman an advance, as a bounty, of three months' pay, to be refunded to the Treasury from any prize money to which such enlisted man may hereafter be entitled.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know what the object of the amendment is, but it has this effect as I understand the resolution: the resolution proposes the enlistment of these men by the Provost Marshal; they are enlisted into the military service, and of course are entitled to the bounty which the Government is paying.

Mr. CONNESS. It is provided especially in the resolution that those enlisted and transferred by their consent to the naval service shall receive no bounties, because they will be entitled to prize money.

Mr. MORRILL. As I gathered it, it was read the other way, "shall not receive prize money because they get the bounty." Is it not so?

Mr. CONNESS. No; just the reverse.

Mr. MORRILL. If it is the reverse, my objection does not apply.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to say one word in regard to the amendment. The propositions contained in the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from California are substantially the provisions on the same subject contained in the enrollment bill which has been adopted by the two Houses, or which is submitted by the committee of conference for the adoption of the two Houses. The purpose which the Senator from California has in view is to anticipate the action of Congress upon that enrollment bill, with a view to get immediate action in the Senate and House of Representatives, in order that steps may be taken to-day as I understand to fit out one special ship's crew for a vessel now lying at Fortress Monroe and ready to sail for the Pacific coast.

Mr. CONNESS. It has been there for ten days.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state to the Senate that there are at this time thirteen steamers ready for sea, which are lying at the wharves unable to go to sea for the want of crews. There has been such an immense draft by the Army, or by, I might say, the States and the districts of the States to fill out their quotas in the Army, that it has been impossible for the Navy to get any recruits. All the emigrant-runners, and all the persons in New York who have been in the habit of procuring mariners for vessels, have now turned recruiting agents for the Army, and they even pick up the sailors who get leave to go ashore from our vessels-of-war for a day. As is very common with those sailors, they become inebriated, and when they wake up the next morning they find themselves with a soldier's uniform on, enlisted into one of the United States artillery or infantry regiments. Then they have got to be reported as deserters, punished as such, and restored to the Navy. A large portion of the sailors who come in from our men-of-war or the merchant marine and are discharged, are immediately picked up and thrown into infantry regiments, so that it is impossible for the Navy to procure recruits.

Now, my proposition is simply that there shall be three months' advance pay, in the shape of a bounty, paid to each person who shall hereafter enlist as an ordinary seaman or as an able seaman, to be refunded out of any prize money that may be hereafter due to him, if he shall be so fortunate as to serve on a vessel which captures a prize.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not object to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand the Senator from Maine has no objection to it. I thought he had.

Mr. MORRILL. I misapprehended the effect of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the Senator from California, if this resolution is intended to meet a particular object, whether it would not be as well to limit its operation to some specified time.

Mr. CONNESS. I am perfectly willing to agree to that. But I hope before that is done the question will be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that amendment will not obtain; that the Senator from Iowa will not press it now.

Mr. GRIMES. The proposition which I made is more calculated to accomplish the Senator's purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand it; and as a permanent proposition I shall be willing to agree to the Senator's amendment on any other bill or resolution; but I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa and to the Senate that the War Department and the Navy Department agreeing in this resolution, they will, under it, be enabled to get any number of men that they need now for this special service without the Senator's amendment. The Navy Department is receiving every day letters from seamen who have enlisted in the Army, having been discharged from the Navy in our ports after finishing their term of service, and then becoming intoxicated were picked up by those who are seeking to obtain a portion of the bounty offered to soldiers, and placed in the Army. They write to the Department trying to get transferred to the naval service. There is no provision now by which transfers can be made. This is not a provision to meet their particular cases, but to enable the Navy Department to avail itself of that particular class of men, and with the consent of the War Department to transfer them. The resolution already provides concerning the matter of bounties and the matter of prize money.

I wish to say a word further, and no more. We are liable every hour on the Pacific coast to have our exports of gold stopped. There is but one vessel on that coast that is able to meet a privateer, and her crew to-day is held by force beyond the term of enlistment under Admiral Bell, and he has so telegraphed to the Department here. The condition of affairs there I do not wish to speak of at length, because I do not desire to give it publicity to the country and to expose the danger in which our material interests stand from the assaults of one single ship of the enemy. I hope nothing will be done to delay the passage of this resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment which I propose is not calculated to delay the Senator's resolution, but is calculated to facilitate it and to enable us to fit out the other vessels which it is proposed to send to the coast of California. I will state to the Senator from California that I hold in my hand a letter from Admiral Smith to me on this very subject.

Mr. CONNESS. Permit me to suggest to the Senator that if he will let the vote be taken without further discussion I shall not oppose his amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The first of these resolutions, as the Senate have already seen, will cause somewhat of an anomaly in the service. It provides that the Provost Marshal General, an agent of the War Department, shall enlist seamen for the Navy. It is consented to by the Secretary of the Navy, but merely, I suppose, for the purpose of meeting the present exigency which I know exists, not only from the statement made by the honorable member from California, but from other sources. The Pacific ought to be at once supplied with some of our war steamers. I do not know whether the city of San Francisco would be in any danger; I do not know whether the fort at the mouth of the bay is now completed or not.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senator that there is a fort on one side of the entrance to the bay; but in a fog an enemy's ship could pass in at night by going to the other side of the channel, and lay that city under contribution at any moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that fort itself completed?

Mr. CONNESS. It is in a condition for defensive operations, but it has not all its batteries.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only meant by referring to that to say that I concur with the Senator that something ought to be done, and done at once; and therefore I have no objection to passing the resolution, though it produces what is an anomaly in itself. Inasmuch as the resolution as it stands is a permanent one, and would extend through all time until we changed it, I would propose to add at the conclusion of the first resolution that the authority hereby given shall expire at the expiration of one year.

Mr. GRIMES. It will not be used if it is not necessary. Suppose another exigency like this occurs six months hence.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not interfere with the President's authority.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all. It gives the President discretion in the premises. I do not understand the Senator from Maryland to wish to amend it, as the resolution leaves the matter entirely in the discretion of the President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. I do not care anything about it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PRICE OF GAS.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 77.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No.

77) to amend the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that from and after March 1, 1864, the Washington Gas-Light Company shall not receive from consumers more than thirty-three and one third cents per hundred cubic feet of gas furnished by it, subject to a discount of not less than ten per cent. on all bills for gas if paid at the office of the company within five days from the rendition thereof, provided all arrears have been paid.

Mr. WILLEY. The bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not wish to detain the Senate by any reasons which influenced the committee in reporting it unless it shall be desired by some Senator.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I should like to inquire what change is made in the existing charter or law?

Mr. WILLEY. I will state briefly that at the commencement of the present war the price of gas fixed by the act of July 25, 1860, was thirty-five cents per one hundred cubic feet. There was an amendment to that, by the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act making further appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," &c., and by section three of that act it was provided that the company should receive only twenty-eight cents for gas furnished to the Government, and thirty cents per hundred cubic feet for gas furnished to citizens. The present bill provides that the rate shall be uniform at thirty-three and one third cents per hundred cubic feet.

The increased price asked for seemed to be justified by the facts which were made known to the committee. In April, 1861, during the operation of the act to which I first alluded, the cost of coal per ton in the shed was five dollars; it is now $11 50. The cost of lime, another article needed in the manufacture of gas, per bushel was in 1861 seven cents; it is now nine cents. Iron for retorts, &c., at that time was one and one half cents a pound; it is now four cents a pound. Firebricks per thousand could then be purchased for twenty-five dollars; they now cost forty dollars. Labor has increased sixty per cent.; it is sixty per cent. more at this time than it was in 1861.

From the statement that I have made it will be seen that coal and iron have advanced since that time over one hundred and twenty-five per cent., the result of which was that the company at its last meeting on December 30, 1863, was bound to give notice to the stockholders that it could declare no dividend, and I have before me the circular which they published containing the following resolution:

"Whereas the prices of coal, iron, labor, and materials entering into the manufacture of gas, the cost of maintenance and repairs of the works of this company have increased from sixty to over one hundred and twenty per cent., and Congress has reduced the price of gas to consumers more than seventeen per cent., thereby rendering it impossible to manufacture and sell gas without loss; and whereas the operations of the company for the past six months show no profit: Therefore,

"Resolved, That it is not in the power of the directors to declare a dividend."

I suppose that the Senator will hardly expect the company to furnish light to the Government and to the citizens of the District without any compensation or profit. And upon these facts the committee supposed themselves justified in increasing the rates, making them uniform at thirty-three and one third cents per hundred cubic feet, subject to a deduction of ten per cent. for bills presented within five days and promptly paid. This makes the uniform rate paid thirty cents per hundred cubic feet.

With these facts, I think it is but just to the company that the bill, as reported by the committee, should be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 42) to enable guardians and committees of lunatics, appointed in the several States and other countries, to act within the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL.

Mr. DIXON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 79.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 79) to incorporate Providence hospital of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its provisions Lucy Gwyne, Teresa Angelo Costello, Sarah McDonald, Mary E. Spalding, and Mary Carroll, and their successors in office, are made, declared, and constituted a corporation and body-politic in law and in fact, under the name and style of the Directors of Providence Hospital.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with two amendments, the first of which was to insert at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That the real estate held by said corporation shall not exceed in value the sum of $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the close of the third section this proviso:

And provided further, That this act shall be liable to be amended, altered, or repealed, at the pleasure of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I move further to amend the bill by striking out the word "service" in line five of section two, and inserting "serve," and in line eleven of that section by striking out "who" and inserting "as."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those verbal amendments will be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SAVINGS BANK.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the bill (S. No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank was next considered as in Committee of the Whole. The corporators named in the bill are William B. Todd, William P. Dole, Edward Clark, Edward J. Simms, Joseph J. Coombs, Z. C. Robbins, and Thomas S. Gardner.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was to insert the name of John R. Elvans among the corporators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections two and three of the original bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall not take and hold real estate above the clear annual value of $10,000, exclusive of the profits which may arise from the interest accruing on the stock or other securities taken on the investment of the deposits made in said bank, or from a sale or transfer of any stock or securities.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the trustees or managers of said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, receive any pay or emoluments for their services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections five, six, and seven, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the several persons named in the first section of this act shall be the first trustees and managers of said corporation, and shall elect from their number the president and vice president. And all vacancies by death, resignation, or otherwise, either in the office of president, vice president, or trustee, shall be filled by the board of managers at their first regular meeting after such vacancy shall occur, by ballot; and the person having the majority of the whole number present and voting shall be considered duly elected, and not otherwise.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the corporation shall receive as deposits all sums of money that may be offered for that purpose, in such sums and on such terms as are allowed by this act, for the purpose of being invested in any public stock created under and by virtue of any law of the United States, or of any of the United States, or of being loaned out upon bond and mortgage on real estate of double the value of the sum loaned; and such deposits shall be paid to each depositor when required, at such times and with such interest and under such regulations as the board of managers shall from time to time prescribe; which regulations shall be put up in some conspicuous place in the room where the business of said corporation shall be transacted, and shall not be altered so as to affect any one who may have been a depositor previous to such alteration until after personal notice thereof.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no president, vice president, trustee, or other officer of said corporation shall borrow or use the funds of said corporation except to pay the necessary current expenses; and all certificates or evidences of deposit, made by the proper officer, shall be as effectual to bind the corporation as if they were under the common seal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following new sections, to come in as sections three, four, and five:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said corporation shall meet annually in the month of April, and as much oftener as they may judge expedient; and any seven members of said corporation, the president, secretary, or treas-urder being one, shall be a quorum; and the said corporation, at their annual meeting, shall have power to elect a president and a treasurer, who shall give bond in the sum of $10,000 for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and all such other officers as may be deemed necessary; which officers shall continue in office one year, and until others are chosen in their stead; and all officers so chosen shall be under oath to the faithful discharge of the duties of their offices respectively.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may receive on deposit, for the use and benefit of the depositors, all sums of money offered for that purpose: Provided, however, That it shall not hold at the same time more than $1,000 of any one depositor other than a religious or charitable corporation. All such sums may be invested in the stock of any bank incorporated by Congress, or may be loaned on interest to any such bank, or may be loaned on bonds or notes, with collateral security of the stock of such banks at not more than ninety per cent. of its par value, or they may be invested in the public funds of the United States, of the several States, or loaned on a pledge of any of said funds, or invested in loans on mortgages of real estate: Provided, That the whole amount of stock held by the institution at one time in any one bank, both by way of investment and as a surety for loans, shall not exceed one half of its capital stock of such bank; and that not more than three quarters of the whole sum deposited in the institution shall be at any one time invested in mortgages of real estate. The income or profits of all deposits shall be divided amongst the depositors, or their legal representatives, in just proportions, with a deduction of all reasonable expenses incurred in the management thereof; and the principal may be withdrawn at such times or in such manner as the corporation shall in its by-laws direct.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no officer, director, or committee charged with the duty of investing the deposits shall borrow any portion thereof, or use the same, except in payment of the expenses of the corporation; and if any officer, director, agent, or other person connected with said bank and interested with the funds or deposits thereof, shall embezzle or fraudulently convert the same to his own use, he shall be deemed guilty of larceny, and shall, on conviction thereof by any court competent to try the offense, be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to amend the new fourth section by striking out the word "profits" in line twenty, and inserting "interest;" by striking out in lines twenty-one, twenty-two, and twenty-three the words "in just proportions, with a deduction of all reasonable expenses incurred in the management thereof," and inserting "according to the terms of interest stipulated."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment was to add to the tenth section, which requires an annual report to be made to Congress, the following words:

Said returns shall specify the following particulars, namely: The number of depositors; total amount of deposits; amount invested in bank stock and deposited in bank on interest; amount secured by bank stock; amount invested in public funds; loans on security of public funds; loans on mortgage of real estate; loans on personal securities; amount of cash on hand; total dividends of the year; annual expenses of the institution; all of which shall be certified and sworn to by the treasurer; and five or more of the managers shall also certify and make oath that the said return is correct according to their best knowledge and belief.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the original bill, in the following words:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That a misnomer of said corporation by any deed, gift, grant, or other instrument, contract, or conveyance, shall not vitiate the same, if the corporation shall be sufficiently described.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That this corporation may take and hold real estate to the clear annual value of $10,000, and may sue and be sued, and have all the necessary power for the collection of debts and demands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following new section, to be section ten of the amended bill:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may make by-laws for the more orderly management of their business, not repugnant to law; may have a common seal, which they may change at pleasure; that all deeds, grants, covenants, and agreements made by their treasurer, or any other person by their authority, shall be good and valid; and said corporation shall have power to sue and may be sued, defend and be held to answer by the name aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to amend the bill by inserting the name of Samuel V. Niles among the corporators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

WARDEN FOR THE JAIL.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the bill (S. No. 86) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, some suitable person to be warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, for the term of four years, who shall receive an annual salary of $1,200. The warden is to have the exclusive supervision and control of the jails in the District, and be accountable for the safe-keeping of all the prisoners legally committed thereto, and to have all the power and discharge all the duties heretofore legally exercised and discharged over the jails and the prisoners therein by the marshal of the District. Before entering on the duties of his office, the warden is to execute a bond to the United States in the penal sum of $5,000, with sureties to be approved by a judge of the circuit court of the District.

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the original bill introduced by Mr. GRIMES was referred, reported it with amendments. The first amendment was to strike out "$1,200," in line seven of section one, and to insert "$1,600, which shall include all fees and emoluments. And said warden shall annually, in the month of November, make a detailed report to the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after section two the following new section:

And be it further enacted, That the warden of the penitentiary in the said District, upon order of the supreme court of said District or the Secretary of the Interior, shall transport all convicts sentenced to imprisonment beyond the limits of said District to the place of confinement, receiving therefor the actual expenses of himself, guard, and of each convict. And in case of absence or other disability of said warden, the warden of said jail, having the custody of said convicts, shall upon order as aforesaid transport them to the place of confinement, receiving therefor the compensation aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six of section three to strike out "circuit," and insert "supreme," so as to read, "with sureties to be approved by some judge of the supreme court of said District."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is my fault of course that I have not read the bill, though I believe it has been on the table for some time, but I did not know till I heard it read that such a bill was in the Senate at all. I should like to know why it is necessary to change the law as it is. From the beginning of the Government the marshal has had charge of the jail. Whether this marshal has conducted himself properly or not, I do not know; whether he has charged more than he ought to charge, I do not know. If he has not charged more than the law allows and has received too much, we can reduce the fees. In the other case he is responsible to the President. He is appointed by the President; he is a political and personal friend of the President; he was I believe a law partner of the President; he had, when he was appointed and has still the entire confidence of the President; and although such considerations are not perhaps exactly suited to the deliberations of this body, yet I suggest to the especial friends of the President here whether they should aim by legislation at one of his known friends.

As far as I know, I have no information at all that the duties of the office have not been faithfully discharged. I believe the mere compensation he gets as marshal, except such as may arise from his duties in connection with the jail, is very little. The fees that he gets in the Supreme Court of the United States are little or nothing. He is paid a per diem, I think, but all else that he gets, except from the jail, is what he may get for attending the local courts and what he may get as commissions upon the service of executions. What that amounts to I do not know, but I imagine the whole would be comparatively a trifling compensation. I suppose therefore that the greater part of the compensation of the marshal of the District arises from the fact that he has the duty which you are about to take away from him. Under this impression, unless the gentleman who reported the bill can satisfy me that it is a very wise measure, called for by the public interest, and especially in accordance with the wishes of the President, I shall be inclined to vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course I do not know whether it is in accordance with the wishes of the President of the United States or not. I do not know that the marshal, either by virtue of his office as jailer or otherwise, was or was not a partner of the President in the practice of the law. I hardly know that any of these questions arise on the consideration of this bill. They certainly did not arise in the consideration of it in the committee.

This bill was referred to the committee; and we had some facts before us which led the committee to the belief that the public interests would be better subserved by the appointment of a warden, whose especial duty it should be to take care of the jail, and who should not be complicated with those political duties and political relations of the marshal to the President to which the Senator refers, and to which he seems to attach so much importance. All the duties in regard to the jail of course are simply those of a jailer and nothing more; neither political nor confidential; and we found that the marshal had little or no practical duties at all at the jail; no care of it. As a matter of fact it was in the hands of a subordinate appointed by him; and it seemed to the committee that it was proper enough that the person who really had the charge of it should be held responsible to the Government; and that the duties would be quite as faithfully performed probably by the person who should be charged with them and held responsible to the President. That was the principal reason for confiding the duty to a warden.

But, sir, there was another reason which entered into the consideration somewhat, and that was this: the convicts at the penitentiary we found had been taken from the penitentiary and transferred to this jail, and they had been taken from the jail under the order of the Secretary of the Interior, in some respects, in others from another quarter, and had been transferred from the District of Columbia to the penitentiary in the city of Albany, where they were authorized to be confined for punishment by an act of the last Congress. I believe about one hundred and forty prisoners were thus transferred from this jail under the direction of the marshal, and perhaps under his personal supervision, to Albany; and from the papers submitted to the committee we found that the charges of the marshal for transferring them from this city to Albany were $6,814 20. It seemed to the committee that that kind of exorbitant charge was an improvident transaction, which appeared to call for some interference on the part of Congress to regulate the affairs of the jail; and to provide against a repetition of that, we have made it the duty of the warden who is to have special care of this prison to perform that work as a portion of the duties of jailer, charging therefor simply the actual expenses, and there does not seem to be any good reason why he should charge any more.

I believe that these were the two reasons which influenced the committee to report this bill. If these are at all satisfactory to the honorable Senator from Maryland, I hope he will not find it necessary to oppose the bill further.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they were at all satisfactory I would not oppose it; but they are anything but satisfactory. The fact which the Senator states, that it cost over six thousand dollars to convey more than one hundred and forty prisoners from here to Albany, may or may not be a good ground of charge against the marshal; but it is not so great a charge as one would suppose. Thousands seem large, but it is only about forty-five dollars a man, I think. He has to take them from here, keep them on the road, provide for them—how he provides I do not know. He has to guard them. I suppose that if he takes eight or ten prisoners at a time he must have two or three men to guard them, and he must pay the guards. But if it was not so, if it is true that the committee, with the sanction of the Senate, mean to act upon the principle that every officer is to be legislated out who charges the Government too much, our whole business would be taken up in legislating officers out. The proper way to meet such a case would be to go to the President if the man has not performed his duty. He can be turned out by the President at any time; and I submit to the Committee on the District of Columbia that it is really a reflection on the President to put the necessity of this bill on the ground that there is in office a man who gets his appointment from the President, who remains in office during the will of the President, because there is no other way of getting him out than by legislation.

Now, as to the other reason assigned by the Senator. In all the States as far as I know, the general practice is that the officer who represents the courts and is called upon to execute the judgments of the courts from time to time, the sheriff, or the marshal, or whatever may be the name by which the officer is designated, shall have charge of the prisoners. The sheriff is bound to execute all judgments and all executions whether against the person of the debtor or against his property. Where he goes against the person of the debtor—you have abolished imprisonment for debt here, and therefore it does not make so much difference in point of fact, but the principle is the same—he gets possession of the debtor, and what is to become of him? Is he to hand him over to the warden? Does the sheriff or the marshal get rid of the responsibility by handing him over to the warden? His responsibility after the judgment rests on the fact that he executes the process, he is to have the prisoner in court at the proper time. If he has him not there his bond is forfeited.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire how it is in the States. The Federal Government has no jails in the States; and what do the marshals do but turn over their prisoners to the county jailers?

Mr. JOHNSON. The answer to that is that practice exists because the United States have no jails in the States. If the United States had jails there, they would put them as a matter of course under the charge of their marshals.

Mr. GRIMES. That does not follow at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would follow if the system was uniform, and the same system will be found everywhere else. You use the jails of the States because you have no other place to put your prisoners in, and your marshals are discharged from responsibility in a case of that description under the law if they do all they can do and deliver the prisoners up to the persons having charge of the jails. The State is responsible by its officer for any damage that may result.

Why is it that these expenses, which you say are enormous, (and I am not prepared to say that they are not) are being incurred? Who is to blame for that? Congress. Why have you not got a penitentiary of your own? You have never had one since you determined to take for the use of the Army the penitentiary that was here before and badly located. Since then you have been obliged to use the State penitentiaries; and I should like to know—it has always been a puzzle to me; I do not know how it is that everything seems to swing northward, if I may use the expression—why is it that the prisoners here are sent to Albany? We have got a penitentiary in Maryland, and we cannot fill it with our own people. We sometimes have succeeded in filling it with people who are caught there temporarily and commit crime; but our penitentiary is quite large enough to take all the prisoners that are sent from here; and for the soul of me I cannot imagine why it is that these prisoners are sent at an expense of forty-five dollars apiece all the way to Albany. It is not the fault of the marshal; he does not send them there; they are sent by the court, or the President, or whoever does order it, under the authority of a special act of Congress.

Mr. GRIMES. They were sent originally without any authority of law whatever; the War Department took possession of the penitentiary without any authority of law, and then we came in and passed a law confirming and ratifying what they had done.

Mr. JOHNSON. That law was to give to the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand from my friend from Maine, the authority to designate the place where the persons convicted here of penitentiary offenses should be confined, and he selected Albany. You had better legislate him out, too. If these expenses are enormous and unnecessary, why not legislate him out because he is the causa causans, and the marshal is only carrying out his orders?

But I submit, and it is all I have to say on the subject, that the principle of this legislation is decidedly wrong. The President is bound to see to the faithful execution of the duties of officers whom he appoints, and who, when appointed, hold their commissions at his pleasure. If he does not think proper to discharge them when in your opinion they should be discharged, hold him responsible, bring public opinion to bear upon him, and if he goes contrary to all opinion, public and congressional, then there is another remedy. Nobody can suppose that the present President of the United States would place himself in the position even of having public opinion operate upon him justly to make him do what he was unwilling to do otherwise; still less would he go to an extent that would call upon Congress to interfere. I cannot help thinking, I must think so because of the very sincere respect in which I hold the President, that if he was acquainted with facts which would satisfy such a committee as we have now in recommending that this gentleman should be removed, he would be removed or certainly would be told that he would be removed if he persevered in proceeding contrary to law or contrary to propriety.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if the apprehensions of the honorable Senator from Maryland are well grounded, it would turn out that the committee had acted with great indiscretion; but it did not occur to the committee that this was by any possibility a reflection upon the President of the United States. If I had resolved myself into a committee of safety for the President or his friends, I do not believe it would have occurred to me that by any possibility whatever this legislation could affect the President of the United States.

Why, sir, what do we propose? To relieve the marshal of a portion of his duties. Nobody had said, I think, until the Senator from Maryland started the question, that there was a reflection upon the marshal. I had not proposed to offer any testimony implicating the marshal at all. Now that the question is open, and that it becomes necessary for me to state the fact, I will state it a little more emphatically than I did when I was up before, and I think I can satisfy the Senate, if they give me their ears, that here is a wrong against the public which ought to be corrected, and that no suggestion of delicacy toward the President or anybody else should interfere with an honest and fearless discharge of the duty of the Senate upon this question.

Here we find a jail in this city under the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government, the General Government responsible, paying the bills, and we find the marshal, whose duties are principally of a political character, as we are informed by the honorable Senator from Maryland, enjoying a perquisite in this jail, but performing no duties of a practical character, and having little or no responsibility for the jail. We find, as was stated by the Senator from Iowa this morning on another bill, that there are some three thousand persons going in and out of the jail annually, upon which the marshal gets a fee of half a dollar each time they go in and each time they go out. That is one perquisite. We find that these persons are all supported at the public charge; their expenses are paid out of the public Treasury. They cost to him, the Government paying all his help, about nine cents a day each for support; he receives a commutation of thirty-six cents. It is said that he pockets from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars a year; I have not computed it, and therefore do not say so myself; but you will see from the margin stated a very pretty little perquisite in that way.

By an order of the War Department, as I have already stated, the prisoners in the penitentiary were transferred to this jail. The first prisoners that were sent from the District to Albany, were sent under the order of the Secretary of the Interior, and were conveyed there by the warden of the penitentiary. There were forty-two of them, and it cost the Government in money paid out for conveying the whole forty-two, just $110 83. The warden as a prudent man, availed himself of the opportunity of a Government transport bound from this city to New York, put those men on board and provisioned them, and from New York took them to Albany. The principal expense, you will perceive, was provisioning the men on board the transport and taking them to Albany; but as the transport was bound to New York at Government expense, that was no additional item, and the whole bill, as I have said, was $110 83.

After the prisoners were turned over to the marshal to be taken to Albany, the first batch that he took was forty-five in number, and the expense charged to the Government was $2,650. The amount paid by the Government for transporting those forty-five prisoners was $2,250. It was brought up in this way: an act of Congress regulating the fees of marshals generally throughout the country, the fee bill, contains a provision that every marshal, for the conveyance of prisoners, meaning the conveyance of prisoners from the courts to the prisons within his district, shall be entitled to the sum of ten cents a mile for himself and the prisoners and the guards. He makes this general statute, applicable to that general class of cases, apply to this specific case, and in that way he is enabled to run up this fee. I believe he took some fourteen or fifteen men with him as guards, charged for them ten cents a mile both ways, and charged for the prisoners ten cents a mile.

It seemed to us that that was a subject which the committee of the Senate ought to consider and provide some remedy for. It is not known how long these prisoners are to be carried from this city to Albany. As I stated before, I believe the whole amount received by the marshal for taking one hundred and thirty-five prisoners was $6,814 20. Nobody will doubt that, with the facilities of the Government for conveyance between this city and the city of New York, and thence to Albany, this sum is not only exorbitant, but it would seem to be outrageous in times like the present.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to ask the Senator whether the abuses of which he complains would warrant the alteration of the law contemplated, the settled law of the country, everywhere for hundreds of years, that the executive officer of the court shall have the control of the prisoners; whether it would not require, if you make the alteration contemplated here, an alteration in the forms of writs, and an alteration in a great many particulars which have not been foreseen, perhaps, by the framers of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It does not touch the general law at all. It does not propose to alter the general law in a single particular. They are all in the hands of the executive department of the Government. The warden is an executive officer as much as the marshal; and the custody of these prisoners belonged to the warden, and the marshal had no concern with them at all. It was a piece of impertinent interference on the part of the marshal to take custody of these prisoners at all. They had been committed to the warden of the penitentiary; they were in his custody, and if they were to be transported out of this District he was the man to transport them. It was only by force of a special order, to which I have referred, that they were taken out of the custody of the law officer, the man to whom they were confined, and handed over to the marshal. I do not say to enable him to charge the fee, but I say that he availed himself of the opportunity to charge this fee, and I have shown that the proper law officer was the warden.

Mr. COWAN. Those were prisoners who were there temporarily I understand. The question I put is this: by a writ issued from the court the marshal is directed to arrest a prisoner and keep him in custody and have him in court on a certain day. How is he to keep him if the jail is taken away from him and a third person interposed? That is the objection I have to the passage of this bill, because it will beget a very great many alterations in the ordinary administration of courts of justice. For instance, I suppose every time the court directs the marshal to bring in a prisoner they will have to issue a special writ to the warden to deliver up the prisoner, and when a prisoner is to be committed to this warden there must be a special authority on the part of somebody to authorize the marshal to do that. It disturbs the whole frame and texture of the laws as they have been administered for hundreds of years, and are administered I believe without a single exception all over the country. Nobody ever dreamed before of making the sheriff and the jailer different officers. The sheriff himself being charged with the custody of the prisoners may keep them where he will. There is a jail usually provided for him to keep them in, and over that jail he, as a matter of course, from the very necessity of the thing, ought to have control, and supreme control. Under this bill, as I understand, it will be very difficult oftentime to know whom to sue for an escape. Suppose a prisoner escapes in transitu, when he is half in the hands of the marshal and half in the hands of the warden, who is to be sued? The marshal says it is the warden, and the warden says the marshal. How is a man to know? The preliminary question must first be settled. He has either to bring two actions, or run the risk of failing in the first one he brings.

I think we cannot afford to alter this law for the purpose of attaining the end which seems to be contemplated by the committee; and that is to strike the marshal a blow for some abuses of which he has been guilty. If the marshal has abused any of the privileges of this office, the way is not to cure it by tearing up the law which created his office and imposed upon it duties which were perfectly proper, and which have always been recognized to be proper. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will pause before it will attain the purpose in this left-handed way, because I think there is a far better remedy.

Mr. MORRILL. One word in reply. If the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania wants to know who is responsible for these parties, he cannot have given much attention to this bill. In the second section of the bill it is provided that the warden shall have "all the power and all the duties heretofore legally exercised and discharged over said jail," that is all, "and the prisoners therein by the marshal." We impose the same responsibility on the warden that rested on the marshal for the prisoner while he is in his custody, while he is in jail. That is all.

The Senator from Pennsylvania cannot be very conversant I think with the state of affairs in the country if he supposes that we are to disturb the course of proceedings that generally obtains in the country. Can the honorable Senator point me to a single instance in any State where the marshal keeps the jail? Are not all the United States prisoners confined to jail, and when they are in jail are they not under the care of the jailer? I know of no instance in any of the States where the marshal's functions do not cease the moment that he delivers the prisoner over to the jailer.

Mr. COWAN. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask if he knows of any instance in any of the States where the jailer is not the mere servant of the sheriff or marshal; if the marshal has a jail, where he is not appointed by him; and if the sheriff, where he and his bondsmen are not responsible for the safe-keeping of the prisoners whom the sheriff intrusts to the jailer?

Mr. MORRILL. My recollection is altogether different on that subject. By general comity of the State Legislatures the United States are permitted to use the jails of the States, and when the prisoners are committed to the custody of the jailer the authority of the marshal ceases entirely over the prisoner. All the analogies in all the States are entirely at variance with the argument of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. How is it in the case of the sheriffs in the several States? The sheriff arrests and the sheriff brings the prisoner into court; he has the custody of him; the prisoner is tried; he is convicted; he is sentenced; the sheriff has a mittimus to commit him to prison. The moment he is inside the prison the authority of the sheriff is gone forever; and he is in the hands of whom? In the hands of the warden precisely under circumstances similar to those provided for in this bill; so that there is no upturning of any practice; there is no repealing of the general statutes of the United States or of the States. I submit, therefore, if the Senate are satisfied that the interests of the Government require some regulation of this jail, there is no reason of a character such as was stated by the honorable Senator from Maryland why the Senate should be deterred for a single moment from passing the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Neither the Senator from Pennsylvania nor any other person can point to a State in the Union where the marshal, as in this District of Columbia, has charge of the persons in jail. In every State of the Union, persons who are incarcerated in jail for offenses against the laws of the United States are transferred from the Federal to the State authorities, and the marshal's jurisdiction and control of them ceases from the time they are deposited within the precincts of that jail which is owned by the State authorities, and is resumed when they cross the threshold of it and go out on their way to court or on their way to the penitentiary.

In addition to the reasons stated by the Senator from Maine as having actuated the committee in reporting this bill, I may state that there has been such an accumulation of business thrown on the marshal of this District that it is utterly impossible for him to perform this duty. Everybody who is familiar with him knows that his business has called him for several weeks past to the city of New York, and he has been able to exercise no supervision over this jail, as he ought to do. He ought to look after the sanitary condition of the jail. He ought to make, if not daily, at least weekly visitations to the jail to see what is the condition of the large number of men, women, and children who are incarcerated there.

In addition to the ordinary duties that appertain to the marshal's office in time of peace, there has been a vast amount of business growing up in prize cases that has been thrust upon him. All this business he has been compelled to perform by proxy. There has been such an accumulation of it that the District Committee thought it was necessary to divide the duties of the office. Is there anything unusual in that? Are not Senators and members of the House of Representatives in the habit of introducing bills by which to divide up the responsibilities and cares that appertain to a particular officer among two or three or more? Does this strike a blow at the President of the United States, as the Senator from Maryland seems to suppose, merely because the President originally appointed the marshal of the District of Columbia? I apprehend not. We want a man who is able to supervise the jail himself. It is a vast business. I am not prepared to say how many men and women there may be at this moment in this jail, but I know that a year ago there were between one hundred and two hundred. I apprehend that in any State of the Union where there was a county having as large a number of persons within a jail as there are to be found ordinarily within the jail of the District of Columbia, there would in every such case be a separate and distinct warden who should have charge of the jail; and not only that, but they would have a board of visitors who would visit that jail monthly or weekly to see that the warden fully performed his duties to the persons incarcerated, and to the Government, and to the cause of humanity. I do not concede that there is anything very extraordinary in the proposition which is submitted to the Senate by the Committee on the District of Columbia. They want to subserve the public interest by requiring the jail to be properly kept. They know that it is no inroad on the prerogatives of the marshal. We are only taking from him that which is not conferred on the marshal in any State of the Union, and which ought not to have been conferred upon him here, and would not have been but for the fact that originally there was a very small population here in the District of Columbia. At that time, I can readily conceive that the marshal could very well perform not only the duties that properly appertain to the office of marshal but also the duties of jailer. That, however, has long since gone by. Now the duties are too burdensome and too extensive for any one man to properly perform.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I think it is very important to have an executive session this evening.

Mr. MORRILL. I should be very glad to have this bill disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GOLD CONTRACTS.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to regulate contracts for gold; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the payment to volunteers who enlisted before the date of the last call for troops, October 17, 1863, the same bounties paid to those who enlisted subsequent thereto; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CERTAIN ARSENALS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 206) in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals.

I will state that the bill merely provides a method by which the Government may get possession of a portion of Rock island, upon which the Thirty-Seventh Congress directed an arsenal to be erected. It is very important that the bill should be passed now, in order that the title may be obtained and the work carried on in the spring.

I will state further that the bill in addition provides for the condemnation of property by the Government not only in relation to the arsenal at Rock island, but in relation to any other improvements that the Government may desire in future to carry on.

No objection being made, the bill was reported back, and was read in extenso.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor.

GUARDIANS OF LUNATICS, ETC.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman from New York to give way a moment, that I may report back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill which I think will be acted on without debate.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 42) to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States and other countries to act within the District of Columbia, with amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

First amendment:

Strike out all after the word "minor" in the second line, and insert as follows:

Or lunatic, by the proper authority in any State or Territory of the United States, or in any other country, to institute and prosecute to final judgment any suit or action in the courts of the District of Columbia as he might have done if his authority as such guardian or committee had been derived from the proper tribunals of said District; and such committee or guardian may in the same manner collect and receive any sum of money due to such lunatic or minor, and may by deed, duly executed, release and convey to any party entitled to the same, whether by purchase or otherwise, any lands or estates situated in the District of Columbia, the property of such lunatic or minor, or to or upon which such lunatic or minor may have a claim or mortgage, in the same manner as he might have done if his authority had been derived from the tribunals of said District: Provided, That such committee or guardian, before making any conveyance of real estate or release of claim or mortgage thereon, shall file in the orphans' court of said District the official certificate of the judge of the court from which such committee or guardian derived his appointment, that he has given a sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all sums of money received by virtue of the authority conferred by this act.

Second amendment:

Strike out all of the second section after the word "committee" in the second line, and insert as follows:

Or guardian of a lunatic or the guardian of a minor duly appointed at the domicile of the lunatic or minor out of the District of Columbia, whether in the United States or a foreign country, shall be good and effectual: Provided, That said guardian or committee shall file in the orphans' court in said District the official certificate of the judge of the court from which such committee or guardian derived his appointment, that he has given sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all payments so made: And provided further, That in all cases the evidence of the appointment and authority of such committee or guardian shall be first recorded in the office of the orphans' court of said District.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ETC., AT CAIRO.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I yield.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to revive so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1858," as appropriates the sum of $50,000 for the construction of a custom-house, United States court rooms, and post office, at Cairo, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

VETERAN ENGINEER REGIMENT.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SALE OF GOLD.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have risen merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the propriety of making some immediate disposition of the joint resolution which the Committee of Ways and Means proposed to report yesterday authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell gold on hand in the Treasury at pleasure. The mere proposition emanating from that committee has unsettled the market of New York; it has deranged the basis of mercantile transactions; it has deranged exchanges and the value of commodities; and I am appealed to by a very large number of the leading bankers and merchants of New York to ask that some disposition shall be made of that question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is the joint resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the gentleman from New York is going to ask the consent of the House that the joint resolution shall be considered now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to its consideration, but I want to know whether it is before the House or not.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not object, but I ask that the question shall be put to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was waiting to hear what the gentleman from New York had to say.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to say that if the House were conscious of the fact that the pending proposition, unacted on and undisposed of, is perpetrating great injury to the mercantile interests of the country, I am sure they would make some disposition of the subject. I have risen merely for the purpose of asking the House to take up the joint resolution, and dispose of it now either by passing it or rejecting it.

Mr. COX. I will not object if we are allowed to offer amendments and discuss this matter somewhat. I have an amendment which I propose to offer to the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. It will take the usual course.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the reporting of the joint resolution?

No objection was made.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell any surplus gold in the Treasury, which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, at his discretion, to sell any gold coin in the Treasury over and above the amount which in his opinion may be required by the Government for the payment of interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOOPER obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the joint resolution:

Provided, That all sales of gold under this joint resolution shall take place in market overt, after notice given, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LONG. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to give way for a moment to allow me to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment already pending.

Mr. LONG. This is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. I should prefer that it should come in after I have made the few remarks I have to make.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, merely to reply to the inquiries made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] yesterday. And first as to the amount of gold now in the Treasury. I understand that the amount on Saturday night was $18,900,000. Of this sum $18,200,000 was in the sub-Treasury at New York. The estimates from now to the 1st of July, would increase it some sixteen or eighteen millions more, making, by the 1st of July, an amount of about thirty-seven million dollars. The requirements of gold from now to the 1st of July to meet the payment of the interest on the public debt are less than twenty-four million dollars, showing an excess of from ten to twelve millions which might be disposed of under the authority of this joint resolution.

The gentleman further asked me what would be the effect on commercial exchanges of giving this authority to the Secretary of the Treasury. That is rather a general question, and one that is difficult to answer in any concise way. I shall only refer to two things to illustrate what may be the effect of it. Gentlemen may recollect that reference was made the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] to a letter from Mr. Lamar, in which he advises his friends to get up the price of gold as the true way of attacking the Federal Government. I think the effect of this authority to the Treasury Department would be rather to disarrange the plans of those gentlemen who may propose to follow out Mr. Lamar's suggestion, as it would be impossible for them to judge in advance when the Secretary of the Treasury was coming into the market; and if they undertook any measure by which to raise the price of gold, it might possibly prove to the benefit of the Government.

I call the attention of the gentleman to another fact. He may recollect the circumstance of a sudden demand for $12,000,000 for payment of the Army being made on the Treasury something more than a year ago. The Secretary made an arrangement with the banks at New York that they should advance that amount, and advance it immediately for use. The gentleman from Ohio is well aware, from his general knowledge on the subject of finance and currency, that there is but a certain amount of the medium used for money required to conduct the business of any place. The effect of that sudden call for $12,000,000, withdrawing that amount in notes from the circulation of the city of New York, was to produce almost a panic there. It operated as a great check on the operations of the banks; in fact, it was found impossible to pay that amount promptly at the sub-Treasury, and the sub-Treasurer was obliged to grant some facilities—to spread the payment into the Treasury over a few days.

I mention that as an illustration of the effect produced by the accumulation of this amount of gold in the sub-Treasury at this time, thus withdrawing it from use, and putting it where it can not possibly be availed of by the merchants again for several months. The gold is not needed in the Treasury. The effect of this resolution would be to restore the surplus of gold in the Treasury to the channels of trade for the use of the merchants of New York and of other parts of the country. I think its immediate effect would be to prevent what I understand to be now going on in New York—a "corner in gold." There is so much gold accumulated in the sub-Treasury beyond the reach of the community as to enable parties to buy up the small amounts that are offered for sale, thereby forestalling it, and producing what is termed in the language of Wall street a corner in gold. I understand that to be the reason why gold has advanced three or four per cent. during a week or two past in the city of New York.

As to my general opinion of the effect to be produced upon our commercial system, I think the gentleman will be satisfied from what I have said that at least some immediate good will be effected, and will excuse me for declining at present to express any opinion.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this large amount of gold in the sub-Treasury has been placed there from the payment of customs duties or from deposits?

Mr. HOOPER. I understand that the accumulation has arisen from the payment of duties at the custom-house. On Saturday last the whole amount paid for duties in New York was $526,000, and of that sum $506,000 was in gold.

Mr. COX. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what effect the amendment which I have offered would have on the bill? Does he regard that amendment as prejudicial to the Government in its transactions in gold, or will he favor that amendment?

Mr. HOOPER. I should think the effect of that amendment would be prejudicial. It would be giving notice beforehand that gold in large amounts is to be offered for sale, and allow combination to be made to control the sale and keep the gold as a monopoly in the hands of the wealthy brokers and speculators. I think it would perhaps facilitate certain other operations so far as this, that it would be a sort of notice to those gentlemen I have alluded to before, who propose to follow out the suggestion of Mr. Lamar and enable them to guard themselves by the forewarning it would give them of the intentions of the Secretary.

Mr. PENDLETON. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, to be obliged to differ from the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means which reported this resolution; but the consideration which I have been able to give to the subject leads me to the conclusion that the result of the passage of the resolution will be injurious to the interests of the Treasury. I am looking to the interests of that Department of the Government alone in my action upon this resolution. It involves only a question of finance, only a question of sound commercial policy. The Secretary of the Treasury has now power to buy gold whenever he shall deem it necessary. That power was given to him because the law authorizing the issue of notes and bonds provided that the interest on them should be paid in gold. In order to enable him to redeem that obligation it was thought proper to give him power, whenever he should find it necessary, to go into the market and buy gold. He has that power to an unlimited extent. This resolution proposes to give him power to sell gold to the like extent; so that, if the resolution shall pass, the Secretary of the Treasury will have complete power to buy and sell gold whenever he shall think proper.

I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they are clothing the Secretary with enormous power; that he will be authorized by law to go into the gold market of the country for whatever amount he pleases whenever he pleases. There is no good purpose to be accomplished by this resolution, except that stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yesterday, and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] to-day. They told us plainly that the purpose was not to relieve the Treasury, but to relieve the gold market of New York. The premium which could be realized from the sale of this gold would afford no relief to the Treasury. They do not pretend it. They know that if ten millions were sold the premium would scarcely suffice for the expenses of the Government for ten hours. No interest would be saved to the Treasury, for the sale would not be made for interest-paying bonds, but would be made for legal-tender notes, which pay no interest whatever. They did well, therefore, frankly to avow the purpose of this resolution; to state clearly what a moment's reflection would teach any man, that the gold market of New York, not the Treasury of the United States, is the object of solicitude here. To relieve it from stringency is the only good purpose, if that be a good purpose, which can be subserved by the passage of the resolution.

I think I understand the source from which this resolution springs. I know the parties who are urging it forward. My honorable colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means will understand that I mean no reflection upon them, their motives, or their actions. If statements which I entirely credit are to be relied on, private interests are at the bottom of this movement. Persons using gold in their transactions laid in a "winter's supply" last summer and fall, when the price was low. They have exhausted their supply.

They are compelled to buy. The price is higher now than it was then. They want it to be lower. Not a whimper of Government hoarding has been ever before heard. Suddenly they discover that the Government has $20,000,000 of gold in its vaults; that it has hoarded that amount; that the Government ought not to hoard; that if $20,000,000 or $10,000,000 shall be suddenly brought on the market the price will fall and they will be able to buy at a low rate; and forthwith, upon every conceivable pretext, they urge the sale of that gold, irrespective of every other consideration than the state of the gold market to-morrow and their own interest.

We were told yesterday that great stringency exists in the gold market in New York because of the amount of gold in the Treasury there. How much? Eighteen million dollars of gold have accumulated in the Treasury, and if I am not mistaken the returns show there are more than sixty million dollars now on deposit in New York. So less than one third of the amount subject to draft for the purposes of business is in the vaults of the United States.

I claim, in the first place, it is not the duty nor is it within the scope of the legitimate operations of this Government to control (even though that control be exerted for the purpose of relieving) the money market of the country. That is not within the sphere of its proper functions. It ought not to become either a "bull" or "bear." It ought not to become a speculator. It ought not to seek to control the money market instead of allowing the laws of trade to control it. It is a trite saying that the world is governed too much. The saying was never more true than to-day. It never was applied more truly than to our own country. We have abandoned the principles on which the Government was founded. We have cut loose from all our moorings.

Mr. BROOKS rose.

Mr. PENDLETON. I yield to the gentleman, if he desires it.

Mr. BROOKS. I thought the gentleman was done.

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir. There are $18,000,000 of gold in the Treasury at New York. There is the residue of $60,000,000 there to perform the ordinary and legitimate duties of gold in that market. Can it be that the retention of that amount in the Treasury for a few days, and it will be only for a few days, will so derange the gold market of New York that, in order to restore its normal condition, this great power must be given to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. With pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. I inquire, with the consent of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, whether anybody knows what is the desire of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject? He has not communicated to that committee or to this Congress any information as to the propriety of conferring upon him this additional power for selling gold in the market of the country. He applied for the power to buy gold to pay the interest on the public debt. Now, when it is proposed to confer upon him this extraordinary power, he has never applied to the Committee of Ways and Means or to this House for any such purpose. He has never informed us that the granting of that power would be beneficent or not. I submit whether it is proper to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to sell gold, he already having the power to buy gold, and go into the market of New York and become a "bull" or "bear" to raise or lower the price of gold, at his discretion, without his calling upon the House?

Mr. DUMONT rose.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to propound a question to me or to any member of the committee, or to answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will yield to him with pleasure; otherwise I cannot. I am not able to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky. If any of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means are prepared to give a categorical answer as to whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury desires this bill to pass, or whether he has recommended it, I will give way that they may make the answer.

Mr. MALLORY. I am very certain that no member of the Committee of Ways and Means is authorized to give a categorical answer. I merely wished to announce the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has not applied for this power.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I resume the line of my argument. I am prepared to say, sir, that even if the result of this bill would be to relieve the money market in New York; if the very object which the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Massachusetts announce as the one only beneficial object to be accomplished by it could be attained by its passage, I should, nevertheless, be unwilling that the Government of the United States should undertake to accomplish it; and above all I would be unwilling to intrust the operations of the Government in this delicate matter to the head of any Department. I have nothing to say unkind or derogatory of the distinguished gentleman now Secretary of the Treasury. I would not say an unkind word of him, as I have certainly no unkind thought of him. I recognize his ability and his integrity. What I say does not apply personally to him, but to all men alike. I would not intrust to any officer of this Government the power of buying and selling gold, and thus enable him at his pleasure to raise or depress the market.

I would not put it in the power of any man to control speculations, to exhibit favoritism, to reward personal service, or to wreak personal hatred, as might be done under the operation of this bill, if the Secretary of the Treasury were so disposed. It is only necessary for him to throw a few million dollars upon the gold market, and immediately the price goes down. It is only necessary to buy up a few million dollars for the payment of interest upon our obligations, and immediately the price rises. It is only necessary to know when these movements will be made to realize fortunes. It is only necessary to have them made arbitrarily to insure the complete bankruptcy of thousands of citizens.

Mr. HOOPER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the Secretary of the Treasury has not the same power in disposing of bonds, and to a much greater extent?

Mr. PENDLETON. He has great power in that respect—quite as much as any Secretary ought to have—but the disposal of bonds will not affect the market nearly so much, or so suddenly, as the disposal or purchase of gold will. The gentleman knows this far better than I. He could illustrate and account for it more accurately and more easily than I could.

But, Mr. Speaker, another objection I have to this resolution is, that if this money is now sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, before ninety days he will be buying it back, and at a much higher rate. Last Saturday there was in the Treasury in New York $18,907,218 in gold. I think upon that day, perhaps, some five hundred thousand dollars were added to the amount, and by next Saturday the Secretary of the Treasury supposes he will have more than twenty-one million dollars of gold. This resolution proposes to allow him to sell of that amount so much as he thinks is not needed by the Government. Why shall he sell it? The gentleman tells us, to relieve the market in New York! Now, on the 19th of February—to-morrow—the Secretary is obliged to pay, and pay chiefly in New York, $1,906,000 in gold, for interest upon the seventy-three notes; on the 4th of March, scarcely more than a week, he is obliged to pay $851,640 in gold; on the 1st of April, six weeks from this time, he is obliged to pay for the same object $3,165,973 50; on the 1st of May he must pay for the same purpose $14,245,141 33; and on the 1st of July, for the same purpose, he must pay $3,432,282 37; in all $23,601,943 30.

Thus it appears that within the next four months legitimately, and without this power to sell, there must be paid out of the Treasury an amount of gold greater by $5,000,000 than there is now in it. And yet gentlemen tell us it is unsafe, injudicious, and unwise to keep in the Treasury the $18,000,000 which are now there and which we are obliged to pay out within four months to redeem our plighted faith. Yet gentlemen are actually grieving over the amount of gold which we have, and are contriving plans to get rid of it. It is a burden to them; it oppresses them by day and haunts their dreams by night.

They attribute to the possession of that gold all our misfortunes and disasters. They think it not only affects exchanges and the market, but that it affects military movements, and I expect before we close this debate to hear that we must sell our gold—these eighteen million—in order to inaugurate "a more vigorous prosecution of the war," and "to crush this wicked rebellion."

Gentlemen will doubtless reply that the receipts from customs, which must be paid in gold, will furnish an abundant supply, will speedily fill the vacuum created by the sale. The duties are not paid entirely in gold. They may be paid in demand notes. Some of those notes are still outstanding; I do not now remember how many. The amount is not very large; but whatever that amount is, it will be used for this purpose. It is certainly unwise to rely too confidently on a supply from so uncertain a source. Importations may be checked by many causes. If they should be checked, the supply of gold will be reduced or entirely cut off. But we have the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. He tells us in his report that he estimates the receipts from customs—gold and demand notes both—for the current year, at $72,562,018 42, while the interest on the public debt is only $59,164,136 38. This latter amount is obviously liable to be increased by the large amount of interest-paying bonds which are being issued. The balance in favor of the Government is thus $13,377,782 04. How much of this balance will be in demand notes, I am not able now to state with reasonable accuracy. Some portion of it certainly will be. At best, then, even if the estimates, always liberal, shall prove in this instance correct, the balance will not be so large as the smallest sum which I have yet heard suggested as the amount which the Secretary might feel himself at liberty to sell if this resolution shall pass. But for the next fiscal year the receipts from customs are estimated at $70,000,000, while the interest on the public debt for the same period is estimated at $85,000,000, thus showing a deficiency during the year of gold of $15,000,000; that is to say, immediately after the close of this fiscal year, the 1st day of July next, the necessary drain upon the Treasury of gold will be larger than the supply, and a deficiency, apparent immediately, will increase constantly till it reaches the sum of $15,000,000. Gentlemen who propose, in the face of these estimates, to deplete the Treasury, must not wonder that I predict that the Secretary will in that case be compelled to purchase gold; and that, too, at an enhanced rate.

But, sir, there is another phase of this question to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and it is this: it is proposed that the Government shall go into the market with the gold which we have compelled the people to pay for customs, and buy up at a depreciation of fifty or sixty cents its own notes, which we compelled the people to take at their par of gold. It is proposed to go into the market with this gold, and purchase at a reduced price the currency which the Government put upon the market and compelled its citizens to take as gold. When these legal-tender notes were issued we were told that they were money. The Government of the United States impressed upon them as far as it could that quality. Citizens were compelled to take them in the discharge of obligations to pay in gold. They were compelled to take them in discharge of private contracts, in payment of debts and in payment of judgments, where the judgment or the contract was that gold should be paid instead of paper. And now gentlemen propose that the Government, acknowledging that its credit is below par, acknowledging that its promises to pay are not worth the money promised, acknowledging its own discredit, shall sell this gold for its own legal-tender notes at a depreciated rate. Surely, sir, that is a transaction in which we ought not to engage. No honorable man would do so in his own private affairs. We cannot shut our eyes to the facts that the paper money of the United States is not equal to gold; but that is no reason why we should traffic in our own discredit, why we should make a profit out of our dishonor. I think that nothing could so endanger the credit of the Government, nothing so tarnish its good faith, nothing could so dishonor it, as to go now into the market with gold which it has forced the citizens of the country to pay to buy at a discount the notes which it forced them to take as of equal value with gold.

But, sir, I go further. While I believe that the immediate effect of this resolution will be to bring down the price of gold; while I believe that the throwing of a few millions of gold upon the market will immediately cause the price to decline, just as the withdrawal of a few millions would cause it to rise, yet I believe that it will be a step fatal to the credit of the country. What will the bondholders of this country at home and abroad think of our financial skill and ability when they see that we so readily part with that which is the only basis of our credit, which alone enables us to fulfill our obligations, without which we cannot pay the interest on our debts as we have agreed to pay it?

Why, sir, there is nothing which will give the Government of the United States more credit than the assured fact that it has in its vaults all the time ready for use, not subject to contingencies, coin to pay the interest on the public debt, and as much more as it is possible to get there to redeem the debt when it falls due. It will give the Government credit. It will bring up Government notes to a closer proximity to gold. It, in my judgment, will give more credit to the Government than anything which is to result from the petty expedient of reducing the nominal price of gold in the market of New York three, five, or even ten cents in the next few days.

In any view, therefore, in which I can look at this question, whether as a financial operation, as a matter of good faith, as a means of replenishing the Treasury, or as an attempt by the Government to regulate the money markets of the country rather than leave them to the legitimate operations of trade, in any aspect it seems to me that the passage of this resolution must be disastrous.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I must be excused for indulging in a few remarks upon this question, which is one of great importance, because it immediately concerns a large number of persons whom I and other gentlemen from the city of New York represent upon this floor.

We have arrived at last at a crisis in our monetary and commercial affairs which every wise man has foreseen, and that is the period when, from the expansion of our paper currency, our imports largely exceed our exports; and the consequence is from there being in use two species of currency, a cheap paper currency for the people, and a dear specie currency for the Government, so that large sums in specie are accumulating in the custom-house in New York. In other words, we have money so cheap and so plenty that consumption has become enormous, and extravagance universal. Hence we have now become tributary to European nations for all those luxuries that we consume so largely; and payment for them has to be made in that currency which those nations accept, and that is gold.

A glance at the custom-house statistics will bring home this consideration forcibly to the mind of every person. Our increase in imports for the last seven months has been $13,702,251, while our decrease in exports has been $17,933,209. The imports in January were $18,907,000, payable in gold, equivalent to $30,000,000 in currency; while our exports were only about eight millions' worth in gold, equivalent to $12,150,000 in currency; making a difference between imports and exports in one month of about eighteen millions in currency. The tide of trade is turned against us. We are becoming tributary as we were in 1836 to all the European nations for the luxuries which we buy from them, if not for some of the necessities of life. I myself have seen imported into the city of New York hampers of potatoes from Normandy, in France, and many of us have seen that large quantities of grain have been imported into this great grain-producing country from the Baltic and Black sea, in consequence of an excess of paper money, in 1836-37.

Where money becomes of little value from a paper inflation, the productions of all countries will be eagerly sought and consumed. Hence we have become so extravagant in this country from this over-production of paper money that the agriculturist can hardly afford to till his farm; the workman has hardly an inducement to labor. Everybody is being tempted to speculate, and is becoming rich, so that now the agriculturists are deserting their farms and firesides and are overpopulating our cities. Chicago, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, are overrun with people. There are not now in the city of New York tenements enough to accommodate the numbers crowding into it from all parts for the purpose of speculating. The cities are full, and the country is being more or less abandoned.

In this crisis of the currency there appears, to my utter astonishment, a proposition here to cut loose from the only anchor which society has, that is, the gold basis, by selling out gold as a speculation in the customs. What was the policy of General Jackson and of his party in 1836, when the speculation was somewhat like that of the present day? Then citizens of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and of the whole country were buying up lands in Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota. Some constituents of mine owned at that time not only counties but almost whole States in the West. That illustrious man, and those by whom he was surrounded, instead of adopting what is here now proposed, instead of cutting loose from the specie basis, at once issued the specie circular, assumed the responsibility, and ordered all payments for the public lands to be in specie alone, and thereby arrested that enormous speculation at once.

It has been said with great truth that there is a scarcity in gold, or an increase in the price of gold, in New York. Let it be so. In one sense it will prove a benefit if it will only help to stop importations. The curse of the country now is excessive importation—importation of silks and satins and wines, tapestries and cashmere shawls, and luxuries of all kinds. Never was a people so extravagant as is the people of this country at this moment; and if gold will only rise high enough to stop all these importations, it will be the greatest blessing that can possibly be conferred on the country.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to propose a substitute?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. It is to strike out all after the words "resolved, &c.," and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to use, from time to time, any surplus of gold in the Treasury of the United States in the payment of the soldiers in the field, and that in making such payments he shall use such precious metal that in a series of months the amount of gold so used be distributed proportionally among the different divisions of the Army.

Mr. BROOKS. It strikes me, too, that the Committee of Ways and Means has overlooked that important act of Congress passed on the 25th of February, 1862, to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the collection and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States.

Section five of this act reads as follows:

"That all duties upon imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid SHALL be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

"First, to the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States. Second, to the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debts of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 18th day of February, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the payment or purchase of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct."

Mr. Speaker, the public faith, therefore, under this act is pledged solemnly that the coin shall be reserved exclusively to pay the interest on the public debt or to create this sinking fund. There is the public record. There it is written, and it cannot be got over without an utter violation of the public faith. There is no stab so great, there is no damage so great to the Government of the United States as in the slightest manner whatsoever to affect the public credit.

I stand not upon my record; I stand upon the record of the preceding Congress; and in behalf of the public creditor, and in behalf of those who upon the solemn pledge of the country have taken the public bonds, I forbid, as far as it is in my power by my vote, the violation of that record and that public faith there recorded. If the Secretary of the Treasury has more gold than he knows what to do with let him apply it to the payment of one per cent. of the debt of the United States. Let him create the sinking fund there provided. Let him diminish the public debt. There is the way to get rid of the coin, and not in the way proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. Or if he cannot or will not do better, let him anticipate the July interest by act of Congress, if he has not the power now, which will take from the sub-Treasury the excess of gold now complained of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there were no other than the mere political objection, if you choose so to call it, it would be sufficient to my mind. It is the worst policy, it is the most dangerous and alarming of measures, to clothe any man with enormous power over the currency of the country. The President of the United States now has in his right hand the sword, and through the Secretary of the Treasury he has in his left hand the purse; and therefore stands completely the impersonation of despotism. If he chooses to exercise that power, the Secretary of the Treasury can now create, manufacture, and dispose of $1,000,000,000 of paper money. It is now proposed to give him the whole control of the gold of the country. I never before heard a proposition so astounding, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall throw himself into the bedlam of New York and among the "bulls" and "bears" of its money market. I have the greatest respect for the Secretary of the Treasury. I served in Congress with him several years ago, and observed his public acts. I believe him to be an honest man; but I say now, more rigorously than I did the other day, I never in my whole political life saw a man so surrounded with thieves and robbers in every part of the country as the Secretary of the Treasury. I instanced the case of the maker of the public money, Spencer M. Clarke; and I am amazed that the other side of the House has not called for a committee of investigation on the subject. I can go on and name a dozen of men, standing high in the Republican as well as in the Democratic party, that neither a Republican nor a Democrat would trust with the arrangement of his own private affairs.

Yet we now propose to give the Secretary of the Treasury the power over the gold market of the country, to buy at will, to speculate at will. His every breath is to be a breath of gold; his every movement is to be a movement of gold; and it will be worth while to see with whom he talks and to speculate upon his action. The whole property of the country is to be placed in the hands of one man, and that man the Secretary of the Treasury. He is to be clothed with the whole power over the currency of the country. It strikes me as a monstrous proposition from the beginning to the end.

I know the pressure brought to bear upon honorable gentlemen on the other side. A pressure has been made upon me by my constituents. I know some of them will disapprove of the remarks I make to-day, but in four months hence they will think differently and indorse every word I say.

I implore you then, gentlemen of every political party, to hold fast as you can to the specie basis. Throw not open the gold market and let not gold rush through the sluice-ways to Europe, as it will under this resolution. Let there be, at least, a gold dollar to stand upon as a pledge for action hereafter, in that better day when the country will resume specie payment and paper vanish as into thin air.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the enrollment bill. I send the report to the Clerk's table, and when it shall have been read I will make some explanations in regard to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the papers are now in the possession of the Senate, and according to practice a conference report cannot be made until the papers are returned to this House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I supposed the papers were here. I withdraw the report.

SALE OF GOLD BY THE GOVERNMENT—AGAIN.

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose to detain the House but a few moments on the question before it, as all I wish to do is to state, as it seems to me, as clearly as possible, conditions of the proposition as they exist in the resolution.

By the present law gold can come into the Treasury of the United States through the customs and the various other avenues by which it reaches the Treasury. But there is only one avenue by which it goes out, namely, the payment of the interest on the public debt. There was in the Treasury on Saturday last $18,900,000 in gold. That gold is coming in at the rate of four and five hundred thousand dollars a day. Take it at the lowest estimate, and we are having $400,000 of gold paid into the Treasury every day. If this rate continues until the 1st of July next, we will have $74,107,213 in gold.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the Secretary of the Treasury, in his estimate of the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1864-65, does not show that our interest account, which is to be met by the payment of specie, will exceed $85,000,000, while our receipts through the custom-house will amount to but $70,000,000, showing a deficiency for the fiscal year 1864-65 of $15,000,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. I should have answered the gentleman in my next sentence had he not interrupted me. The Secretary of the Treasury reports that there will become due at various periods, ending with the 1st of July next, $23,601,943, to be paid in gold. That is every dollar of coin which the Treasury of the United States is obliged to pay up to that period. Now, there will remain a surplus in the Treasury of the United States, on the basis of the present receipts—and the receipts have greatly exceeded the estimates—on the 1st of July next, of $50,505,270 in gold, and there is no law of the United States, according to the present practice of the Government, for the payment or disposition of that $50,000,000 of gold.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman upon what basis, or upon what data he estimates the receipts of gold from the custom-house, or any other sources, up to the 1st of July next?

Mr. GARFIELD. The estimates are based upon what we have been receiving for several months past, and the fact that the months immediately to come are always better than the winter months. I base the estimates upon what we have been receiving from day to day for many weeks. These estimates may be too large, but that would not alter the principle involved. No one doubts there will be a surplus.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Has the gentleman averaged the daily receipts of gold from that source for the last three months?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say, then, that by taking the average, or a sum rather below the present average—and we have every indication that the average will rather increase than decrease in the coming months—we shall have on the 1st of July $50,500,000 of gold in the Treasury, with no law for paying it out. Now what is the result? There are probably, according to the estimates of gentlemen, scattered through the country in the feet of old stockings, locked up in trunks, put away in bureaus, laid away under the heads of beds, and in the vaults of banks, $200,000,000 of gold. I suspect that to be a large estimate, from all I can gather from the statements of trade.

Now, sir, on the 1st day of July next one quarter of all the gold in the United States will be locked up in the vaults of the United States Treasury and lying there as dead matter. Every dollar that goes in there leaves the amount in circulation less, raises the price of gold, disturbs the market, and disgraces our credit, and yet because it is locked up in the Treasury and we will not pass a law under which it may go out, our credit shall thus go down and down, further and further, as Mr. Lamar and his condutors in the rebel States desire it shall go down, and as his condutors in the northern States seem to desire it shall go down. They are talking in the most anxious manner here—witness the last speech to which we have listened—of returning to a specie basis. Do not gentlemen upon this floor know that no great war was ever waged in modern times with specie? It is one of the settled and inevitable laws of trade that great wars must be conducted with a paper currency and not with gold.

Now, why do we ask that this great amount of capital shall be, from time to time, liberated upon the market? For the best reason in the world. Generally I would not interfere with the laws of trade; they are as immutable as the laws of nature, the laws of the universe; but I would now interfere with them because they are not in a natural and normal condition; they are in a condition superinduced by the necessities of war, and it is to counteract this abnormal state of trade that we are disposed to let loose this gold so as to keep up the credit of the Government. What has so changed the character of gold? Now it is hardly to be called the representative of value, of money; it is almost a commodity; it is fast becoming a commodity instead of a medium of exchange; and if the war continues very much longer, it will be merely a commodity and not a circulating medium. It is well known that when paper currency must and does come into use it expels gold; its natural tendency is to expel gold, just as in nature the softer element expels and drives out the harder; just as water wears away stone, so will a lighter and more valueless currency always drive out the precious metals. Our gold is scattered over the border, driven to Canada, sent abroad, and the amount actually in use for the business of the country is so small that if we reduce it by locking up $50,000,000 in the vaults of the Treasury of the United States, we shall create a panic to such an extent as to ruin the business of the country.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Long] has offered an amendment that this surplus shall be paid to the soldiers in the field. I remember some of the political capital attempted to be made upon the other side of the House on the subject of paying sailors and soldiers in coin, and I remember that remark which was made, and which what I see in the galleries this morning almost prohibits me from repeating, but a sense of justice requires that I should remind gentlemen of it. It was charged on the other side of the House that if we did not pay our sailors and soldiers in gold their wives would become prostitutes. I stood here as a man abashed; I stood amazed and ashamed that I belonged to a body in which such an utterance could be made about the loyal women of this country.

Every gentleman upon this floor knows well that it is impossible now to return to a specie basis. Every man who has looked into the condition of the country knows that it is impossible, without utter prostration and ruin, to attempt to return to a specie basis at this time. It becomes us then to use the gold that we have to keep up the credit of the country, and not to destroy it; and I do not propose to be deterred by references to all these laws and resolutions that have been passed hitherto in regard to the policy of the country.

I am not under such unfortunate circumstances as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] who has just spoken. I am under no pressure from any quarter, from any particular source, from any particular person. I am under no instructions from any man, in office or out of office, how to vote, think, or act upon this subject. They have not honored me with that pressure, and I am therefore free to act as it seems to me the pressure of the country and its interests require; and I ask gentlemen now whether they are willing to help to carry out the scheme of Lamar, of Georgia, to help to reduce, reduce, reduce the value of our paper currency until we shall be ruined as the confederacy is being ruined in its finances rather than its battles.

There are two elements which decide the question of war. One is military, the other is financial. The man who can destroy the finances of a country can ruin it as much as he who destroys its army. It becomes us, therefore, while we replenish our armies on the one hand, to maintain the credit of the Treasury on the other. For that purpose I believe this measure is wise. I know it ought to be guarded; and any amendment that will make it the more carefully worded, and that will protect it from all chances of fraud or corruption on the part of Government officials I will be glad to vote for. But I am unwilling that we should break down the purpose of the resolution, and lock up this money, on the old idea that money locked in vaults is as good as money in circulation.

Mr. STEBBINS. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot acquiesce in the views expressed by my colleague [Mr. Brooks] or by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on this subject. I regard this purely as a business question. I cannot allow myself to identify it in any way with politics. I feel constrained to regard it as having special reference to the traffic in gold that is going on in the country, and to the speculations in all commodities that are now so rife. While the proposition has not come, as I understand, from the Secretary of the Treasury, and while we are only acting on the belief that it would be satisfactory to him to have such power confided to him, still I have no doubt that he regards this question as one appealing with all its strength to every individual in the community precisely in the same way as it appeals to himself.

The speculations going on in the city of New York at this moment are not by any means confined to gold or to any single article. They apply to every article connected with the industrial enterprises of the country. The maintaining of the present high price of gold is absolutely indispensable to the success of these various enterprises. Hence the speculators of the whole seaboard are interested in maintaining the price of gold in special connection with the operations in which they are engaged. Apart from these enterprises is the speculation in gold itself. The operations in gold are not confined to the mere purchases necessary to pay custom duties, nor to the amount necessary to pay for our importations. Gold has become necessary every day, to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars, for the purpose of liquidating transactions of a peculiar kind which take place in the city of New York, not only for the account of our citizens, but for the account of citizens of neighboring cities and all over the United States. It is necessary for these speculators that the high price of gold should be maintained. The Government, however, finds itself in the attitude of actually sustaining the price of gold, while all its interests are directly on the opposite side. It is receiving gold to the extent of three or four or five hundred thousand dollars daily. Hence the volume of gold in the city of New York is diminishing every day. The banks hold on to their reserve with the utmost tenacity, and it is not at all likely that that reserve will be seriously diminished, no matter at what prices gold may range for the next six months. There is, therefore, but a certain amount of gold in the market to subserve not only the purpose of exports and the purposes of the independent Treasury, but also all those various purposes connected with transactions growing out of large operations in exchange. The exchange drawer is compelled to go into market and buy gold, as against bills, by a species of traffic known in New York as the right to deliver gold or the right to call for gold. When the contract is for thirty days or for sixty days, one party or the other is compelled to hedge, as against his operation, by a positive purchase. These transactions in gold have prevailed over two and a half years. Hence the operations daily taking place, not only in the stock exchange of New York, which are but an infinitesimal portion of those that take place every day, but in the streets and in the hotels at night.

This House will at once perceive that the amount of gold necessary for the daily transactions in New York is so large that if gold is continued to be hoarded by the Government the advance in its price will be maintained just in proportion as the volume diminishes, and everything else whose value depends upon the price of gold will advance in price as a logical consequence.

Now, sir, I contend that if the Secretary of the Treasury did not ask for the passage of this resolution it may be perhaps for the reason that he supposed this House would of itself appreciate its importance and positively direct him to do this thing. This bill looks to a sale of gold, the excess of what he may have over and above the necessities of the Government. Those necessities are clearly and distinctly defined. We know what they are, and, in my judgment, it is perfectly clear this House ought to move with great unanimity and ask the Secretary of the Treasury not to permit an artificial state of things to take place so that the volume of gold shall not be so reduced as that these innumerable contracts cannot be fulfilled except by daily advancing the price of gold, and so advancing the necessities of life and everything in which the country is directly or indirectly interested.

Mr. Speaker, it has been urged by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] and also by my colleague from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that this is conferring extraordinary powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury. Sir, the powers which have been conceded to the Secretary of the Treasury for the last two years and a half everywhere in this House will be acknowledged to be large, broad, and general. Yet, sir, these gentlemen admit that he has not up to this period manifested the slightest disposition to use these powers to the prejudice of the Union, in which declaration I most entirely and cordially concur. I think we have good reason to suppose that he will not exercise this power except in one direction—and I ask the House to look at it carefully for one moment—and that direction in all respects in favor of the people and the nation, and cannot be used by any possibility in the opposite direction.

Mr. Speaker, this is a power to sell, it is not a power to purchase, although the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] called the attention of the House to the fact that by a law of the last session he has the power to buy. It is more to the interest of the Secretary of the Treasury to avoid the purchase of gold; more to his interest to bring about a reduction in the price of gold, and all the energies of his administration have no doubt been leveled in that direction for a long course of time.

I cannot say that I agree with him in the policy he has adopted. If I had been in the last Congress, and had the power to cast a vote, I would have voted against the legal tender. I do not believe in it. Yet I come into this Congress and find the principle established and deemed absolutely essential to the prosecution of the war—that is, the principle of paper money. I recognize it and regard it as entitled to everything I can do for it; and I feel it to be the duty of every individual member of this House to do everything to strengthen the Treasury and not to do anything to weaken it. We may oppose the principle, and may at a later day revolutionize it; but I appeal to the House whether it is not our solemn duty to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury with additional power to enable him to get along with the onerous and responsible duty imposed upon him. I therefore shall not hesitate to record my vote for the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, as a general principle, the safe way of legislation is to follow the reports of committees. The question before the House is of such importance that I feel justified in expressing an opinion which is in a degree the result of the opportunity I have had to know something of the financial affairs of the Government and to draw certain conclusions concerning the financial interests of the country. I think that the security of the country is in the preservation of the public credit. However successful we may be, within the limits of the most sanguine, in military affairs, if the credit of the Government is destroyed we cannot prosecute this contest to a successful termination.

The first great measure on which public credit rests is the economy of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Treasury; next to that the holding of public officers to a rigid accountability; and next in taxation and judicious legislation to provide means for the payment of the interest on the public debt. We must, moreover, pursue a policy which shall render it reasonably certain in the public estimation that the principal is ultimately to be paid. The national creditors believe that they have a guarantee in past legislation, sanctioned by public opinion, that the interest of the public debt is to be paid in specie. We have, as we are told by the Committee of Ways and Means, or are to have on the 1st of July next, a surplus of $11,000,000 of coin in the Treasury of the United States.

I do not at all concur in the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that because we have received $500,000 on one day or on each of two days, that therefore it is reasonable to estimate that during the next four months, or during the next sixteen months, the same sum is to be daily received. We have collected in the office of internal revenue $750,000 in a single day; but it does not follow that we are to receive three quarters as many million dollars per annum as there are days in the year. We can arrive at a correct result only by looking at the average receipts for weeks and months, or even for an entire year.

Now, it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the estimate of receipts of gold for the fiscal year 1864-65 is $70,000,000. On the other hand we have to provide, for the payment of interest on the public debt during the fiscal year 1864-65, $85,000,000 in specie. According to the statement made this morning there will be a surplus of gold on the 1st day of July next of $11,000,000. To that surplus add the estimated receipts for the fiscal year 1864-65, and we have an aggregate of $81,000,000—showing a deficiency on the 1st of July, 1865, of $4,000,000. It is now proposed to sell the temporary surplus of specie which we now have or which we are to have on hand on the 1st of July next. If the estimates of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] be correct, the $11,000,000 anticipated surplus will enable the merchants to pay their custom-house duties for twenty-two days, and no more. When that sum is exhausted they must go into the market and purchase specie at such rates as may be demanded.

And if it should happen after we have sold the gold on hand that the receipts at the custom-house do not meet the estimates of the gentleman from Ohio, and that we are obliged to go into the market and purchase fifteen millions of specie in order to meet the interest for the fiscal year 1864-65, what do you think will be the effect upon the credit of the Government? Instead of gold selling at a premium of sixty per cent., it is more likely to sell at a premium of one hundred or two hundred per cent. Thus you impair the credit of the country at once. And with all deference to the Committee of Ways and Means, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that to sell the surplus specie—which is merely a temporary surplus—will inflict a shock upon the public credit. It is our desire and our duty to strengthen the credit of the Government; and the suggestion I make is that if the propositions already before the House be not accepted I will move to amend the resolution so that it shall read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to anticipate the payment of interest upon the public debt from time to time, upon a rebate of interest by the holders of coupons at the rate of six per cent. per annum in gold.

It seems to me the true way of sustaining the public credit and of relieving the business and commerce of the country, is by the payment in coin of the interest on the public debt. The effect of this will be to make the coupons due in July and January next redeemable in gold; and then if the merchant has a custom-house debt to meet, he has but to go into the market and buy coupons, payable in July and January, and convert them into gold. The effect will be to relieve the money market at once from this pressure by paying out the gold from the independent Treasury to the holders of the coupons. We receive the gold again by its payment for custom-house dues, and thus the Government is always kept in funds with which to meet its interest.

It seems to me it is wiser to pay our debts which are to be paid in gold than to sell the gold at any price, and run the risk of being driven into the market, a circumstance which would not only increase the price of coin, but injure the credit of the Government. The public credit to-day is based upon two great facts—the promise of the representatives of the people, and sustained by the judgment of the people of the country, that the interest on the public debt shall be paid in coin when it is due, and that the principal is ultimately to be paid by the development of the great resources of this country, in the character of its people, and in its untold agricultural and mineral wealth. When you destroy public confidence in the disposition or ability of the Treasury to pay the interest in gold you deprive the Government of the means of carrying on this war, because the war, however heavily you may tax the people, is to be carried on upon credit and not upon money.

It is a misfortune, undoubtedly, that gold is at $1 60; but the truth about it is—and in this, perhaps, I differ from gentlemen around me—that the paper of the country has depreciated. We may as well admit that and take the facts just exactly as they are. Great Britain for twenty years after the suspension of 1797, through its statesmen and financiers, undertook to convince the world that gold had increased in value, and that paper had not depreciated. Whenever paper money cannot be converted into coin according to the numerical values assigned to each, then the paper has depreciated in value. The policy of the Government should be to restore its paper currency to an equal value with gold as soon as practicable. Admit the difficulty; admit the fact; guard against the increase of the value of gold by increasing taxation and diminishing expenditures; and provide at all times for the payment of the interest on the public debt in specie.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the amendment he suggests is in order now as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I offer it now.

Mr. HOOPER. My colleague will allow me to remind him of one fact. His argument seems to be based on the idea that this joint resolution proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the surplus gold. It merely authorizes him at his discretion to do so.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My answer to that is that I have not seen the Secretary. I have never heard his opinion; but I assume when the Committee of Ways and Means come here with so grave a proposition as this, that in that proposition they have the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I assume that the Secretary of the Treasury will be ready to act upon it as soon as the authority is given him. I have great confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, and do not concur at all in the censorious remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] as to his being surrounded by thieves. Still I am unwilling to place in the hands of any person a power of this character with the expectation that it is to be exercised. If the proposition is that this power shall be exercised, I say it is the duty of the House to consider whether we ought to confer it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will now be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to anticipate the payment of interest upon the public debt from time to time, upon a rebate of interest by the holders of coupons at the rate of six per cent. per annum in gold.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The question is asked me, How will you compel the holder of coupons to surrender them to the Government? Of course you cannot compel him to do it. But if a person has a bond, the interest on which will be due in July or January next, and he can obtain gold for the coupons now, he will look at it as a matter of business; and the question will be whether he will take the gold from the Treasury now or in July or January next. And therefore, whenever there is a pressure upon the market, as the gentlemen from New York say there is now, and it is difficult to get gold and those who have agreed to furnish it are in a corner, they will be relieved of the pressure. Under such circumstances it will be for the interest of the holder of coupons to convert them into gold, because he can get more for his coupons or their equivalent in gold under the pressure upon his neighbor than he can expect to get next July or January. As a business matter, therefore, whenever there is a pressure for gold, coupons will come into the market, and when there is no such pressure the holders will retain them.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall; and an act amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863; when the Speaker signed the same.

SALE OF GOLD—AGAIN.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor. Mr. PENDLETON. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from New York, to propound a question to my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. With pleasure. Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] a question in regard to some financial operations of the Government in reference to which he can probably give me an answer sooner than I could get it by looking at the Treasury report. Within the last two or three years—I am not able to state the date exactly—a law was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive gold coin on deposit at four per cent. interest, for which he was to issue certificates that could be used for certain purposes. I have an impression on my mind that the Secretary has reported to this House at some period that in this way some forty or fifty millions had been deposited in the Treasury of the United States, for which certificates had been issued. I desire to ask my colleague whether there is any such loan, and if so whether it has ever been paid back in whole or in part?

Mr. HOOPER. So far as my knowledge goes, there was in the spring of 1862 a large amount of demand notes in circulation, which were receivable for public dues. There was, as the gentleman from Ohio may recollect, an insufficiency of gold coming into the Treasury to meet the demands for interest on the public debt. And I think that in January, 1862, or later—

Mr. PENDLETON. Not later than 1863.

Mr. HOOPER. In January, 1862, there was a loan made. I do not recollect the amount, but my impression is that it did not exceed five or six million dollars. It was to bridge over the period till these demand notes would become exhausted, and till the duties should be paid in gold. All that loan, I understand, has been paid back. It was made from the banks in gold. Certificates, payable in gold, were issued, and they have been all paid many months since. We have now got to the period where the receipts of gold are in excess of the wants of the Government.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is desirable that a question of the magnitude of this one should be discussed on its merits, and in no factional or partisan spirit. I do not mean to say that any gentleman on either side of the House has indulged in any such spirit. But I do think that if there is any question of importance, next to that of the war itself, it is that question which this resolution necessarily opens up for consideration and discussion. Therefore, sir, in what I propose to submit to the House, I shall make an effort to take a view of this immediate question and of the system of finance out of which this proposition necessarily grows, which shall not reflect personally either on the Secretary of the Treasury or on the President.

This, sir, according to the advocates of the proposition, is a temporary expedient. The proposition, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, without the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, is to authorize that officer to put into the market any part of the $18,000,000 in gold now on hand in the Treasury which may not be required for the payment of interest; and the grounds on which the two gentlemen who advocate the adoption of the resolution and who are attached to the Committee of Ways and Means support it are that it is necessary to relieve the money market. Now, Mr. Speaker, without referring to the novel proposition that the Congress of the United States is to regulate the money market of this country, without alluding to the fact that it is unprecedented, especially in time of war, for the Congress of the United States to pass its time in proposing temporary expedients to affect the money market in Wall street, what are the facts with regard to the money market itself at this time? Sir, I referred this morning to the money articles of three of the leading newspapers of New York of yesterday. The money article of the New York Herald says:

"Money continues plenty, much more so than suits the wishes of lenders, who are forced to seek customers at six per cent., and in some instances even less rates are accepted."

The money article of the New York World of yesterday says:

"New York, February 16.—The deposits in the banks are increasing, and the amount of capital seeking employment in temporary loans is largely in excess of the demand. The market rate for first-class loans is six per cent., and exceptional transactions are made at five per cent."

But, sir, we have another authority, which I think the gentlemen on the other side will not disregard, the New York Tribune:

"Money is more abundant, and at six per cent. the supply far exceeds the demand, and at an early hour in the day it was apparent that less than six per cent. must be accepted or large balance be left idle. Every day adds to the volume of the currency through the issue of national bank notes and the five per cent. Treasury notes, and there is no indication of any change in the financial wants of the Government by which a reduction can be made of the paper money upon which values now float. The legal tenders are to be withdrawn, and the credits based upon them must be reduced at a future day; but that step will plainly be preceded by a further expansion of national currency and Treasury notes, under which values of commodities will be inflated. The Government is getting all the money it needs at five per cent. per annum, payable in currency, and until the military position changes there is little reason to suppose that a new policy will be adopted."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the principal ground on which it is attempted to justify the passage of this joint resolution is, in my judgment, not founded on a basis which this House and Congress should regard for an instant, because it is not the fact. Why, sir, were it the fact that we had a stringent money market I would hail it with pleasure. It is the reverse of a stringent money market that the people have to fear; it is that inflation to which my colleague has made reference; it is expansion; it is high prices of all kinds of commodities; it is the prodigal expenditure not only of public money but of the private money of the country, leading to extravagance, leading to corruption, leading the public mind astray from the great public interests of the country, which makes it for the interest of speculators and public plunderers to continue the vigorous prosecution of the war that enables them thus to keep up the inflation of the currency of the country.

I say, therefore, that were it true that the money market was stringent, that "money was tight," that fact would operate as a wholesome check to the reckless, downward course of this Government and this people under this intoxication of an expanded currency.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a mere temporary expedient, according to the arguments which have been adduced in its favor; it is merely for a temporary purpose rendered necessary to sustain a policy which is utterly wrong in principle that this Administration is pursuing in its financial course. I hold that it is pursuing a policy which no sensible gentleman or merchant would pursue; that it is in utter disregard of the plain, common principles of self-security and safety.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] from the Committee of Ways and Means, has told you the amount of gold expenditures required to meet the necessities of the Government before the 1st of July next. In answer to that, his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] told you that according to the average amount of gold received into the Treasury from customs the Government would be more than able to meet the $25,000,000 required to meet the gold interest that will have accrued on the public debt before the 1st of July next. He has made reference to the fact that from four to five hundred thousand dollars have been received from customs in gold in a single day.

That, sir, was an isolated instance. I have before me an estimate of the entire amount of gold receipts into the Treasury from customs in the last four months. The whole amount from October 1 to February 13 was less than $26,000,000; while the whole amount that will become due payable in gold—including $5,000,000 that will become due on the 3d of March for interest on one-year certificates—up to the 1st of July next is $28,150,000.

Therefore, if the Secretary of the Treasury acts under this proposed legislation and puts this eighteen or nineteen millions of gold into the market, he will place himself in the position of being compelled to go into the market again to purchase gold or fail to meet the public liabilities of the Government as they become due.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment to make an explanation in reference to the statement he has just made as to the amount of gold received from customs in the last four months, going to show that it is not an exact criterion by which to judge of the future. It will be recollected that in the last four months a very considerable amount of demand notes have been received from customs, but the demand notes have now nearly all returned to the Treasury, so that in future those receipts will be all in gold, and the amount thus received very considerably increased.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The duties for the four months to which I have referred are reported as follows:

October.....	$6,238,943
November.....	5,075,846
December.....	5,748,189
January.....	6,180,356
February 6.....	1,171,201
February 13.....	1,785,101

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that no individual in the ordinary transaction of his own private affairs, if he had notes to pay within the coming four months to the extent of $25,000,000, and had in his possession money and securities to that amount, and had no other resources by which to meet his accruing obligations, no rational, sensible, intelligent man of ordinary capacity, under such circumstances, would, I say, part with his only reliance upon which he can maintain his credit and take up his notes. And, sir, this whole system of Government finance is no mystery. The same simple principles which apply to the ordinary affairs and transactions of life, even to the smallest and minutest degree, apply to Governments dealing in their thousands of millions of dollars. Sir, you cannot meet an obligation of $100,000,000 except you have property to meet it with, unless you borrow the money or get it in some other way. In other words, if the expenses of the war are $1,000,000,000 you have got to have a revenue of that amount or to borrow it.

And that leads me, Mr. Speaker, to a consideration of the fallacious system upon which the finances of the country are now being conducted. We have had other wars in Christendom. We have had expensive wars. We have had wars costing $100,000,000 a year. The system of finances attempted to be adopted here is not new in the history of the world. It is as old as Christendom; and whatever merit there is in the present financial system, no man now living can claim the originality of the invention.

Sir, paper money was established originally under Charles I. Previous to his time, when a monarch found himself in a strait, his resource was not to paper money, it was to debase the coin of the country, and give an official stamp to the representative of value by depleting the intrinsic value contained in the coin itself. Charles I originated paper money. What was the consequence? Charles II, whose administration was almost as profligate as this, ended in bankruptcy, ruin, and repudiation. That was the result of the paper-money enterprise in those days, and that will be the result of the present application of the same principle. I could go on with other historical references on this subject, and show in every instance that when a nation has attempted to sustain such astounding expenditures by borrowing, by disseminating its credit in lieu of gold, where its expenditures are in great excess of its income, it must, sooner or later, go to the wall and become bankrupt.

The great Pitt rescued the British nation by his financial system from utter financial ruin; and I believe they have the same sound financial system there now. Take her policy during the Napoleonic wars from 1812 to 1815; and it would be a profitable study for the financiers of this House. What was her policy in 1812? The whole expenditures of Great Britain at that time (she was fighting the great Napoleon and one half of Europe and the United States of America) were $450,000,000. And how did she raise it? Under our present system they would have raised $50,000,000 by taxation, and borrowed the rest. Her expenses for 1812 were $450,000,000. She raised by taxation $325,000,000, and borrowed only $125,000,000. In 1813 her expenditures were $783,000,000, and she raised by taxation $345,000,000, and borrowed the rest. In 1814 her expenses were $410,000,000, of which she borrowed only $55,000,000. In 1815, at the close of the period to which I refer, her expenses were $675,000,000: taxation, $360,000,000; loans, $315,000,000. The population of Great Britain at that time was about two thirds of what it is to-day.

Now that was a system which maintains public credit. Everybody here to-day is discussing the question or rather the expediency of putting into the market the paltry sum of $10,000,000 in gold, just as if it would have any influence upon this great question. In regard to our finances it is nothing more than a drop of water in the bucket.

Mr. Speaker, we are rolling up here an expenditure for posterity to liquidate to the amount of thousands of millions of dollars. It may be asked, as the Hibernian did, "What has posterity done for us, that we should care for it?" We do not care for it, because we intend to saddle it with an incumbrance which it will be impossible to bear.

But posterity must sit in judgment upon the transactions and events now occurring. Posterity must pass its unprejudiced and disinterested verdict upon what is being transacted in our day and generation in this unfortunate country. Posterity, not ourselves, must dispose of this great public debt which is rolling up at the rate of $1,000,000,000 per annum beyond the legitimate revenue of the country.

But the ordinary expenses of this war, arising partly from necessity, partly from corruption, are so enormous that the question we are discussing of the expediency or in expediency of selling gold is of very little account. In 1861 the currency of this country consisted of $150,000,000 of bank notes of all denominations; $50,000,000 of fractional silver coin, and $40,000,000 of gold of all denominations. That currency was ample for all purposes at that time.

Three years ago next August our experiments in paper money commenced, and we have already issued $1,000,000,000 of currency. We have in demand notes, payable in gold, $760,000,000. We have in greenbacks and legal tender $450,000,000. We have in two-year five per cent. legal tender, $50,000,000. We have in one-year legal tender, $20,000,000. Of postal currency we have $20,000,000; and of fractional currency legal tender, $50,000,000. We have national currency, not legal tender, issued by the new banks, $6,000,000. Thus we have a total currency issued by the Government, and including the issues of the old banks, $1,000,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not the bounden duty of the Congress of the United States to make some provision of a permanent character with reference to this great question, instead of spending our time from day to day legislating upon measures of trivial consequence? As was truthfully and eloquently said by my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] the other day, why are we disregarding the ruin staring us in the face, which must bring this war to a speedy close whether we will or not, by a collapse of the Treasury?

I tell gentlemen if they are to prosecute this war, if they are to continue expenditures at the rate of the last three years, the end is nearer than they expect. It may be that God, in the infinitude of His wisdom, may be working out this great problem on the continent of America in a way little suspected by us, the immediate actors in this sad tragedy now being performed before the world.

I had risen, Mr. Speaker, more for the purpose of alluding to the great question than to the immediate subject before the House, and to express the hope that at an early day this man so familiar with questions of finance, the Secretary of the Treasury, whose name has been sounded throughout America as a successful financier, may find time from the duties not directly pertaining to his Department, to take up this greater question, the finances of the country, and propose some system which shall enable us to sustain the public credit; that he would, not relying upon the success of our armies, or on the price of gold in Wall street, devise some great system which will satisfy the public creditor, assuring him of the constant liquidation of the public debt, and the prompt payment of its interest, so that he may leave to posterity, as Alexander Hamilton left to posterity, a name that will live in history.

Mr. KASSON. In my judgment, the debate upon this question has wandered somewhat widely from the resolution offered by the Committee of Ways and Means. I regret that the gentleman last upon the floor from New York [Mr. FERRARO WOOD] should have seen fit, upon a practical proposition of this kind, which has not been surpassed in practical importance by any question which has been presented to this House, to have himself so far departed from the real question before the House as to renew the peace propositions which, I believe, he has incorporated into every speech which he has addressed to the House. I differ, wide as heaven from the earth, from his idea that because we do not accept that theory of his, the public debt of the country is now being increased to the magnitude and extent which we all understand. I will so far depart from the question, to which I shall soon return, as to say that if that gentleman and his audience, which though "select" is certainly "few," both in this House and in the country, would lend their moral power, their efforts, and their powers of eloquence to unite the people of the North in solid phalanx to suppress the rebellion by force of arms this debt of ours would soon cease to accumulate, and those soldiers with whom they profess so much sympathy at this time would be permitted early to return to their families and their homes.

But, sir, I ask again, coming back to the question, what is this proposition before the House? It is not to sell, as was suggested I believe by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] the entire amount of gold in the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary, the discretion of the Secretary is limited to selling the surplus on hand not needed to pay the interest on the public debt and not needed for other purposes; and that is the express language of the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I rise merely to correct the impression which the gentleman seems to have that I made an erroneous statement as to the reading of this resolution. I understood it not to authorize a sale of the whole amount of gold on hand, but only of the surplus which the Secretary of the Treasury may think he has on hand. Understanding the resolution as well as I did, I certainly did not mistake its provisions, and the gentleman has derived a wrong impression as to the person from whom that statement came.

Mr. KASSON. That is probably the case; but one of the gentlemen upon the other side of the House who have opposed this resolution spoke distinctly about giving the Secretary power to put this seventeen or eighteen millions on the market at once. The resolution is especially guarded in that particular, and only gives the Secretary discretion to sell that which is not required by the Government for the payment of interest on the public debt and for other purposes.

And that brings me to the objection of the gentleman from New York on my left, [Mr. BROOKS,] who declares that we are here proposing to perpetrate a breach of the public faith which has been committed to the retention of every dollar of gold received into the Treasury of the United States for customs. I submit to the gentleman that he is mistaken as to the character of the law. The law, which is before me, provides that the coin so paid in shall be set apart as a separate fund and applied first to the payment of interest, secondly to the payment of one per cent. of the public debt, and third that the residue thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Now, this resolution does not propose to touch one dollar of the coin in the Treasury which is appropriated specially for specific purposes, but it only relates to the surplus that shall exist in the Treasury beyond the wants of the Government as now established by written law, and the discretion of the Secretary is limited to that excess, and does not extend to the coin which is specially set apart and reserved by law.

So much, I think, will satisfy the mind of any gentleman as to the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means touching its conflict with the public faith. Sir, there is no man in this House who has a higher or deeper regard for the preservation of the public credit than myself. I will labor to sustain it, tax to sustain it, fight to sustain it, and my voice will ever be lifted to sustain it.

But the next objection runs against the extent of the discretion conferred. In reply I say you cannot reach the remedy except by giving this discretion. And nothing in the financial career of that officer should lead us to distrust his fidelity in the use of such a discretion. I challenge any gentleman upon the floor of the House to tell me in what solitary particular, in the exercise of the large discretion granted to the Secretary of the Treasury, he has ever violated the pledges that existed by law or that existed in understandings between him and the financial people of the country. There is not a financial man in or out of New York who will not say to-day that the Secretary of the Treasury has faithfully and honestly observed every obligation he has ever assumed in his transactions with them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa if the Secretary of the Treasury has not already, previous to this time, disposed of gold from the Treasury, and in the manner in which it is proposed to give him authority to do it under this resolution?

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman mention the time or the fact to which he refers? Does he make that charge?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not know that I can give the time, but I understand that he has heretofore thrown gold upon the market in the manner proposed in this resolution.

Mr. KASSON. My answer is, first, that I never understood such a thing, and do not believe such a thing. If the gentleman knows it I ask him to state the authority on which he makes the charge.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was so informed by one member of the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday. That gentleman is here now and can speak for himself.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that if any gentleman knows any fact of that kind he will state it. I have no such knowledge.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to answer the inquiry made on the other side of the House? In conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury I learned—

Mr. KASSON. If my friend from New York will allow me, perhaps I ought not to yield for a quotation of private conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury, unless the gentleman's own discretion guide him in that particular. I believe that it is contrary to the usage of the House. Certainly the Committee of Ways and Means has declined to refer to any such conversation.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The Secretary informed me that not one dollar in gold from the Treasury of the United States has ever been disposed of contrary to that law.

Mr. KASSON. That concurs entirely with my own opinion, information, and belief. I proceed to say that while this discretion, hitherto vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, has been by general consent, and so far as we know, used for the best interests of the country, I can see no objection to extending that discretion to the point proposed.

Mr. ALLEY. If my friend from Iowa will allow me, I will say that a few days ago I was told by a gentleman who said he knew, that the Secretary of the Treasury had in two or three instances thrown into market a considerable amount of gold; but I have since been informed by a high officer of the Government who knows all the facts, that nothing of the kind has ever occurred, and, further, that there was no authority of law for any such action, and no such sale was ever made.

Mr. KASSON. Again, sir, it comes to the same point—that nobody knows anything about it, and that the proper sources of authority have denied the existence of any such fact.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I refer the gentleman to one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER.]

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman will have the goodness to state his question, I shall be very happy to answer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not know the fact, and I do not make any such charge; but the question that I asked was whether the Secretary of the Treasury had not heretofore thrown gold upon the market.

Mr. HOOPER. Not to my knowledge. My impression is very decided that he never has done it. If I have conveyed the contrary impression to the gentleman he misunderstood me.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I so understood the gentleman yesterday, in his conversation with myself and the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not mean to convey any such impression as that the Secretary of the Treasury has sold any gold out of the Treasury since this act was passed.

Mr. KASSON. I am glad, on the whole, that this full interpellation has taken place, as it tends to destroy any suspicion that may have existed in any mind on the subject. I am no political or personal partisan of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I will stand by him, as I will by every man who is faithfully using the powers, whether great or small, which he possesses for the best interests of the country; and I believe that this can be truthfully said of the present Secretary of the Treasury.

This resolution, sir, does not run in conflict with any proposition of law. It is not dangerous as giving discretion that surpasses former financial discretions which have been granted and have been well employed. Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the existing condition of facts respecting gold. I said at the opening that it was a question of great practical importance. It affects this question of the relation between gold and paper currency, every department of business, and every part of the country. There is not a constituent of mine who buys a pound of tea who is not affected by this question; there is not a constituent of yours, Mr. Speaker, or mine, who buys a single article of necessity or luxury imported from abroad, who is not interested in this question; there is not a soldier in the Army, or a sailor in the Navy, who receives his pay from the United States, who is not interested in this question.

Sir, just in proportion as you reduce the inequality between gold and currency, just in that proportion do you increase the value of that currency and enable the consumer to purchase any article in the market at a lower rate of value, enable him to get his money's worth.

Now, sir, if by virtue of the laws of the United States this Government is accumulating gold in its Treasury beyond the legitimate wants of the Government for disbursement, I challenge any gentleman upon the floor of this House to tell me what right we have, as the representatives of the interests of the people of this country, to continue to hoard this gold, inflating the premium thereby, and with it to inflate the price of every article that you and I and your constituents and my constituents have to purchase in this country.

The proposition is simply this, that just in proportion as you lock up the mainstay of commerce, the gold of the country, just in that proportion do you advance the price of everything we have to buy; just in proportion as you advance the price of gold itself do you enhance the price of everything that comes from abroad.

Now, Mr. Speaker, such being the conditions of value, what do we find in the large cities of the country, and especially in the city of New York, from which the gentleman [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] comes, and to which most of the foreign goods imported into this country come?

A few months ago, having occasion to visit my business agent in New York, as I passed down a principal street, I encountered a crowd collected on the sidewalk, extending down the steps into a subterranean apartment, and stretching away into the dark interior, and two or three policemen standing at the entrance, apparently engaged in preserving order, with an amount of noise and confusion that was the best illustration of the conception we have been taught to have of ancient Babel or modern Bedlam I ever witnessed, a tumult and uproar beyond the power of the imagination to conceive. There were men there of nearly all complexions, the features predominant being hooked noses, bushy eyebrows, and long beards.

I made my way at last through the crowd to the office of my friend and asked him what was going on—whether there was a police court so near to the great mart of business in the city of New York. He said no, it was the gold exchange! There were fifty or one hundred men combining in all the various phases of speculation to raise the price of gold and to inflate the price of every article which my constituents and yours have to buy; bringing, for the sake of advancing their own personal profit, inconvenience and loss upon the people of the whole country. Mr. Speaker, it would require a good deal of self-control upon the part of any man to prevent a blush of patriotism at the sight of such reckless speculation against public credit. Sir, I fear the combinations at these dens in New York—kept open, as these men adjourn from one to another, for almost all hours of the day and night—more than I fear all the combinations of the rebel power at Richmond in their attempts to shake the public faith and break down the public credit.

If it is in the power of this House to give authority to anybody in this Government who we believe will exercise that power for the best interests of the country, to break up that illegitimate traffic, I am for giving that power to its utmost extent.

I repeat that it is in these financial transactions so called, not legitimate commerce, but illegitimate transactions, that the great danger and peril to the public credit exists.

When the gentleman from New York last on the floor [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] says that this is a proposition to regulate the money market, I reply that on the contrary it is a proposition to allow legitimate merchants and regular traders to conduct their regular transactions without interference on the part of Government by exhausting the market of the material most indispensable to their transactions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 81) to apportion the expenses of the levy court in the county of Washington upon the basis of population; and

A bill (S. No. 82) concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia.

Also, that the Senate insist upon their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill of the House (No. 122) to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes, and agree to a conference asked by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and have appointed Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. JOHNSON the managers at the said conference on the part of the Senate.

SALE OF GOLD—AGAIN.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to allow the money market to regulate itself without the interference of the United States in thus accumulating the gold of the country.

Now, sir, I pass to the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] He proposes a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. His substitute is to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to buy up interest coupons which are ultimately to be paid in gold, and thus restore the gold to those who possess the coupons. I am willing to commit to him that power. It is right he should do it, and to the extent that affords a remedy I should desire to see him have it. Yet I think the House will see with little reflection that it only shifts the difficulty which now exists in the market. That difficulty is on the part of the merchant in buying gold necessary for the transactions of commerce in the city. What must he do under this proposition? He must buy coupons in lieu of gold, and take them to the Treasury for the gold. The coupons are gold. They will bear the same price with gold. Speculation affects them like gold. The merchant must pay the like premium to get them; coupon holders and gold holders will be identical and will combine. It is proposed to do by indirection what is now done directly. It is the buying up of gold represented by gold coupons instead of gold represented by coin. As I have said, I have no objection to it as an auxiliary proposition; so that whenever a man, under any circumstances, can get interest coupons cheaper than he can get gold he shall go to the Treasury and get gold for them in advance of their maturity. That is limited, however, by the amount of coupons offered and by the amount of gold in the public Treasury. But in addition to this the committee's proposition is necessary for the purpose of preventing all those combinations to which I have alluded.

The object of this resolution is to restore this surplus gold into the channels of commerce, and undoubtedly its incidental effect will be to check the spirit of speculation so rife in New York. I wish the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who spoke early on this question, would go home to his constituents and lecture them on their indulgence of those luxurious habits respecting which he addressed us to-day. I wish he would tell those gentlemen who are filling their stores with diamonds and gold trinkets, silks and satins, that they ought to discourage importation of those luxurious articles instead of stimulating the luxurious tastes of our people. It is undoubtedly an evil in the land, and I will unite with him to check that evil and retain in the country every useless dollar now sent abroad. I will go for an increase of the tariff so far as is consistent with the maintenance of the public credit. I will do anything to get us back to a self-sustaining system as far as possible.

One of the leading financial men on the continent of Europe told me recently that the moment we got this rebellion so much down that it was a question of time only, from two hundred to four hundred million dollars would come from Europe for investment in securities of the United States—that it would seek our securities without our asking.

I regret from the bottom of my heart to hear gentlemen on the other side declare that we are on the eve of bankruptcy, or there is danger that our public credit will not be sustained. I have not the data here, but I have collected them, to show that with a moderate taxation we are abundantly able to pay the public debt which is now being created, and upon which we are now paying or shall have to pay interest. There is the property in the country to pay it; there is the energy to pay it; and there is the patriotism in the country to pay it and sustain it.

I beg therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the House will consider these propositions with reference to their immediate effect. Suppose that not a single dollar of gold is sold from the Treasury for three months, yet the very existence of this power upon the part of the Secretary to take a million, or two millions, or four millions, from time to time, to relieve the money market in New York, will render it almost impossible for men in the large cities to make what is called in the language of the brokers' board a "corner" in the gold market. They could not do it, for the existence of this power would knock the corner all to pieces. I do not know that that is an expression of the brokers' board, but such will be the effect.

It is for this reason, in part, that I think it of the highest importance that this power should exist upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury. What is the legitimate use of gold in this country? We want enough of it to pay the interest on our debt, and enough to pay duties, and pay our indebtedness abroad. Aside from that there is no legitimate demand for gold as an article of commerce in this country. We simply want it to pay our public liabilities at home, and, as far as foreign importations are concerned, to pay their duties at the custom-house, and to pay our indebtedness to foreign countries. There is an abundance of gold for those purposes. We are producing enough from day to day in the gold mines of this country to discharge every one of those liabilities. By means of hoarding and making "corners" these speculators are creating an artificial demand for gold; they are making time contracts for gold; they are speculating in it in all shapes; and this power will destroy that system of contracts. A man will not contract to take from you $1,000,000 of gold a month hence at a specified premium, when, perhaps, the day before the Secretary of the Treasury may have a surplus of four or five million dollars to put upon the market. There can nothing be plainer than this effect of the passage of this resolution. It will approximate the price of gold to the point which meets the legitimate demand for it. I do not care where you lodge the power if it is only safely deposited and will produce this result.

I think my remarks have covered the principal objections, if not all, which have been raised by the other side of the House. Since I stated a few facts yesterday in explanation of the necessity of this law, I am glad to find that my opinion is concurred in by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means from New York, [Mr. STEBINS,] a gentleman whose large experience in financial operations in that city gives, more than any opinion of mine can give, confidence in the propriety of this measure. His testimony to its probable financial result and its efficiency would, aside from any opinion of mine, be conclusive upon my judgment.

I ask the House, to the extent of its power, to relieve the country from this venomous spirit of speculation in hostility to the best interests of the Government, by giving to the Secretary this incidental power, which we now propose, to relieve the regular market from the control of speculators and to reduce the difference between the value of currency and gold to a legitimate rate, proportioned to the supply and demand for real transactions.

Mr. DUMONT. This resolution, as I understand, comes from the Committee of Ways and Means. I am always reluctant to disagree with them, and am always disposed to sustain them in whatever meets the approbation of my mind. The first gentleman from New York who spoke upon this matter [Mr. Brooks] seemed to be exceedingly excited because, under the existing state of things, the importations of the country exceeded the exportations. I have read the history of the country in vain if such has not frequently been the case in periods of profound peace. During the Administration of the younger Adams, the most economical Administration in the history of the country, an Administration under which the whole expenditures of the Government amounted to only $13,000,000 a year, the importations of the country frequently exceeded the exportations. And now that half the ports of the country are closed, and half of the farming and mechanical interests of the country are withdrawn from their legitimate business, I think that no gentleman ought to be astonished that at a time like this, when the country is engaged in such a war as this, our importations should exceed our exportations.

And the other gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is wonderfully astonished at the inflation of our circulating medium. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that the history of no civilized and enlightened Government that is now known to the world affords a single example of a war being carried on upon a specie basis. Why, the gentleman himself conceded that. He said that the monarchies of the old world, when they are engaged in wars, are in the habit of debasing the coin of the country. Does he want the United States to resort to that expedient at this time? Does he think that that would be a preferable measure to issuing the promissory notes of the Government, valid obligations that have hitherto been faithfully redeemed, which have entered into the circulating medium, and are sought after as the best currency of the country? If the gentleman prefers the debasing of coin, making an eagle worth ten times as much by legal enactment as its intrinsic value, then all I have to say in regard to that financial proposition is that it does not meet my approbation, and I do not think it would meet the approbation of any gentleman who reflected well upon the subject.

The gentleman held statistical information in his hand, and he compared the amount of notes in circulation in the country at the commencement of the war with the amount in circulation now; he made the wonderful discovery that the circulation has vastly augmented within the last two or three years, and he came to the conclusion that it must be the result of this terrible war. Well, sir, that is a legitimate conclusion, almost as legitimate as that of the Hibernian who when a funeral was passing by, and being asked who was dead, replied, "Well, I don't know, but presume it is the gentleman in the coffin." [Laughter.] It is quite a logical inference, quite a legitimate conclusion, one on which he will find very few gentlemen to differ with him, that all this has been occasioned by and has been the necessary and legitimate result of this terrible strife in which we are engaged.

I understand the gentleman to be for peace; I also am for peace; and the only difference between us is that I am for peace upon the condition of the restoration of this Government in all its integrity, and he is for peace at all events. Well, there are many ways to bring about a peace. One way is at the point of the bayonet; one way is at the point of the naked sword; one way is to crush out this rebellion by the brave soldiers that are in favor of putting it down. Another way would be to concede all the rebels ask; to admit that they waged war for a lawful cause, that the North is all in the wrong and they are all in the right, and that it is our duty to ground the weapons of our unholy warfare against them, to acknowledge their independence, and to give them guarantees for the future. Another way is to fall back on a specie basis, and that in all probability affords the key to the exceeding anxiety of these gentlemen to fall back on a specie basis. That is the end of the war. That is the end of the war instantly. It cannot be prosecuted one single moment after we fall back upon a specie basis. The history of the world may be searched in vain, the history of warfare may be conned over, every leaf ever written on the subject may be looked into; you cannot find the example of any civilized nation where a war of any kind, much less a war assuming such gigantic proportions as this terrible war does, has been carried on upon a specie basis.

I therefore can say, Mr. Speaker, in all candor, that I oppose the passage of this resolution with great reluctance, and that I do not at all chime in with the gentlemen on the other side in their opposition to it. Their plan seems to be to give the Government a dig under the fifth rib. My opposition to it is on a far different basis from theirs. I have no disposition to cavil with the Government. It came not into power by my vote or with the aid of my humble influence. But I have no disposition to cavil with it when to cavil with it is to paralyze its arm and give aid and comfort to the enemy. I am opposed, however, to the passage of this resolution; and why? I have listened to the remarks of the eloquent gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and would be exceedingly glad to be able to agree with him. I have just as much confidence as he has in the able head of the Treasury Department. I would just as lief commit this power to him as to any man in the Government, or to any man who has been in the Government since the days of Alexander Hamilton, in point as well of integrity as of ability. I oppose the resolution therefore not out of any hostility to the Secretary of the Treasury, but because I think it involves a violation of public faith. I believe that the law has already made an application of this money. The law provides that the duties on customs shall be collected in coin, so that the Government might have money enough to meet its obligations for the payment of interest in coin. It then declares that this coin shall be applied only in a certain way. I do not contend for a single moment that one Congress can bind another; but I think that if Congress pledges the faith of the Government, and if third parties intervene in transactions and act on that pledge, then other Congresses are bound by the pledge thus given.

I do not interpret the act of Congress as the gentlemen from Iowa does. I say that it pledges this money to the creation of a sinking fund to be applied to the payment of the public debt. The Secretary of the Treasury is not bound to take in the public debt at par. It is much better for him to go into the market and buy up the bonds of the Government than it is to throw the surplus gold on the market. I do not care how honest the Secretary of the Treasury may be, I do not care how good a financier he may be, "where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." This resolution would convert the Treasury Department into a great broker's shop; and the constituents of the gentleman would be seen hovering around it like the eagles around a dead carcass. I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury is an honest man, notwithstanding the character of those who surround him; but we must recollect that he is the successor of a Cobb, and that his successors may not be proof against such men. And I am not willing to commit this power to everybody who may by chance happen to be Secretary of the Treasury.

I am not generally very much in favor of the amendments that are offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] but I concede that the amendment offered by him to this resolution is a very good one—that is; that if the money is to be thrown upon the market it is to be sold in market overt. I shall support that amendment with a view of perfecting the resolution; but I think I shall be compelled to vote against the resolution itself. I have an amendment of my own which I shall offer, before I take my seat, as an additional proviso to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I want to guard this matter in every way I can; and my amendment is that a sale of gold shall not take place without the consent of all the heads of the Departments. In our own State, Mr. Speaker, extraordinary power is frequently vested in one of the executive officers; but he is prohibited from exercising that power without the advice and consent of his colleagues. I therefore send up the amendment which I propose to offer to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COX. Before the gentleman offers his amendment, I desire to say that I propose to modify mine somewhat, and as the modification may affect the gentleman's amendment, I will state it at this time. I propose to make my amendment provide for giving public notice of at least five days before the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell any gold under this act; and further to give him power to withdraw any gold so offered from sale, if, in his judgment, the public interest requires it.

Mr. DUMONT. That will not interfere with the amendment I propose to offer in the least. I propose further to place restrictions upon the operations to be carried on under this bill, if it shall become a law, by adding as follows:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not sell any gold under this act without the advice and consent of all the other Executive Departments of the Government, and that the operation of this act shall cease in one year after the passage of this act.

One single word, Mr. Speaker, for I do not desire to take up the time of the House. I think this is a temporary measure. It is not brought forward by those who advocate it as a permanent measure. There would be no surplus of gold in the Treasury if the laws were precisely what they should be. Let us therefore so amend our revenue laws as only to bring into the Treasury what gold is needed by the Government for disbursement, and then if the House decide to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the surplus now on hand in the Treasury, let us indicate by our legislation that the authority for such sale is merely to meet the present exigency.

Mr. COX. I wish to add just a word in support of the amendment I have offered. I think if this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to pass at all, it should be with the amendment I have proposed—not that I favor the proposition at all in any shape. I have not been impressed, from the arguments I have heard upon the other side of the House, in its favor. From all I can learn I understand that at least fifteen million dollars more will be required to pay the interest on the public debt before the 1st of July than will probably be received into the Treasury from customs. In other words, the specie in the Treasury, if it is sold to-morrow, will have to be bought back again very soon afterwards.

But, sir, I did not propose to discuss the general question at this time, but merely to make a remark in favor of my amendment. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to be opposed to my amendment because it will have the effect of producing combinations among bidders, and so prevent competition, and raise the price of gold. Well, sir, that is not the result of pursuing such a policy in other matters, and I am at a loss to see how the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts in this regard can apply to the present exigency for which this measure is to provide.

Gentlemen all know how sensitive the article of gold is in the market. Every click of the telegraph from Washington or from the head of the Army will change its price. It is as sensible to every movement as the barometer is to the change of the atmosphere, and it ought not to be placed in the control of any man, whoever he may be, however large his virtues or wisdom may be. I will not say that he would, by secret operations, control these great financial movements, these great monetary interests, which so pervade and ramify through all the avenues of trade and commerce; but I will not trust any man with the power thus to go into the market and control the currency in that way. No, sir; if it is to be done, let it be done in an open and fair manner, after public advertisement for a proper time, and then there will be competition, then gold will come down. If it is desirable that gold should come down, if gentlemen would not follow the advice of the rebel Lamar, they will vote for my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not expect this matter would occupy the whole day. I am anxious to get at and pass a little bill to save the public lands from being sold for taxes. When it was proposed to take up and pass this bill this morning, I supposed the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] was anxious to relieve the merchants of his city from the high price of gold, but now I find that he wanted the bill brought up mainly for the purpose of delivering a speech, which had been very ably prepared, upon political questions. As, however, now it seems that the merchants of New York do not desire relief; as I see from the course of their Representatives upon this floor that they are willing to be ground down between the upper and nether millstone, I think it is proper that we should have further consideration of this matter in the Committee of Ways and Means, where it has not yet been considered at all maturely. There are now three important amendments offered which it may be proper to incorporate in this bill in some shape, so as to make it work well. I therefore move to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with permission to report at any time.

Mr. LONG. I have offered a very important amendment, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me in order that I may explain it to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I am nearly suffocated now, and I cannot stand any more.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be sustained.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to permitting the Committee of Ways and Means to report at any time?

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

Mr. VOORHEES called for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not vote against the motion to refer if it be understood that the Committee of Ways and Means shall have power to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order, if this matter be recommitted, to direct the Committee of Ways and Means to report to-morrow? I deprecate all delay in regard to this important matter, and I want it settled as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the House, except by unanimous consent, to require a committee to report at any particular time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I hope there will be unanimous consent. I want a speedy decision of this matter, so that the decision may be known and not withheld that speculators may profit thereby.

There was no objection; and the matter was accordingly recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the matter was recommitted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXES ON GOVERNMENT LANDS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, called up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States. It appropriates, to pay taxes on lands owned by the United States, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. This is an important matter, and if I were allowed time to look into it I might be able to furnish the House with some information on the subject. I understand that the taxes which this resolution proposes to have paid were illegally assessed.

Mr. STEVENS. The joint resolution is reported on information furnished by the Treasury. The lands are situated in the State of Iowa, and the Government had to take them from defaulters. The taxes are due, and if not paid the lands will be sold. The appropriation is necessary, and I do not see what objection can be made to it. The amount is only $20,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is a good deal.

Mr. ALLISON. The lands in question are in my district. They have come into the hands of the Government on account of the prosecution of defaulting officers. Unless the taxes are paid the lands will be sold.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question, that I may offer an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by adding to the resolution, "and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House where these lands are situated, and what is the amount of taxes paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I should like to offer this amendment:

Provided, That in cases where the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied that the taxes have been illegally levied, none of the money hereby appropriated shall be applied in payment of the same, but proceedings shall at once be commenced to enjoin the collection of such taxes.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield for that amendment. I hope there will be no such embarrassment offered. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION OF CUSTOM-HOUSE OFFICERS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Ways and Means Senate bill No. 66, to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. ODELL asked unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution construing the act approved July 17, 1863, calling out the militia for nine months, so as to entitle men called out under its provisions to be paid the bounty of twenty-five dollars.

Mr. ELIOT objected.

Mr. ODELL. I am rather surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts would object, as petitions on the subject from his own constituents have been referred to us.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the resolution is founded on petitions from the constituents of the gentleman from Massachusetts I object to it.

Mr. ODELL. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. It is only a declaratory resolution of the intent and meaning of the enrollment bill.

Mr. VOORHEES withdrew his objection.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ODELL. Many petitions have been referred to the Military Committee on this subject, and under the instruction of that committee I have reported this resolution. The President called for one hundred thousand militia for nine months. A large portion of these nine months' men received the bounty of twenty-five dollars, and another portion did not. This joint resolution simply extends that act to the effect that each man shall receive twenty-five dollars. It is an act of justice to the soldiers, who are waiting for this money.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ODELL moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of House bill No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, reported from the select committee on the subject, on which the gentleman from California [Mr. COLE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, since obtaining the floor last evening, I have found a little time to condense such views of this bill as I wished to present to the House, and the few notes I have prepared will contribute sensibly to that desirable end. The time of this body while the war lasts, I say it with all deference, is too precious to be taken up with vain utterances, and I acknowledge to a very considerable degree of diffidence, lest betrayed I should be into the use of unnecessary words.

It is clear now that the learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] who last addressed the House on this question, and who has written a book—I do not intend to impeach the literary character of other gentlemen from that State; each one, for aught I know, may have written a book; neither do I desire to manifest any of that malevolent spirit that Job displayed when he exclaimed, "Oh that mine adversary had written a book!"—but the literary gentleman from Ohio has not always entertained the opinions in reference to the negro that are generally accorded to him. The elegantly written extracts that were read from The Buckeye Abroad by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] show that when its author was in Rome he did as the Romans do, and I entertain a lively hope that when he becomes fully convinced that it is the fixed purpose of the nation to put down this insurrection by force, and in no other way, he will again pay respect to the injunction, "when in Rome do as the Romans do," and heartily coöperate with this side of the House, lending his powerful influence toward bringing about a peace in the only proper way. In fact, I thought I discovered in some of his expressions last evening the outcroppings of genuine abolitionism. I should feel a little more certain on this point were it not that another and rather antagonistic idea seemed to predominate throughout the gentleman's speech. He appears to be troubled with a sort of hallucination that the project to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs is one grand scheme for the amalgamation of the white and the black races, nothing less, nothing more.

I have in vain tried to discover how the providing the means of subsistence for the freedmen, and all the comforts that flow from paid industry, can have a tendency to promote amalgamation; and, notwithstanding the gentleman's most virtuous indignation against the bill, springing out of this idea, I am equally at a loss to know how persons who are exercising their own volition, and have perfect freedom of action, are any worse off in regard to this matter than those whose purposes are subordinated by law to the desires of others.

If the gentleman will consult the census reports he will find that the number of mulattoes in the single State of Virginia was some ten thousand more than in all the free States put together; and if his statement be correct, that mulattoes do not propagate, it leaves a very strong presumption that amalgamation had something to do with this result.

The gentleman entertains strong feelings of distaste toward this side of the House, because, as he somehow infers, we are theoretically in favor of amalgamation; and I will not quarrel with that feeling so honestly entertained by him; for I remember that de gustibus non disputandum, and this business of amalgamating is purely a matter of taste. But how happens it that the very learned and astute gentleman from Ohio never conceived any disgust toward his quondam friends down South, who, as the census shows, were so very much addicted to the practice of amalgamating with their black slaves?

I will now turn from the gentleman from Ohio to the proper consideration of the bill, not a more agreeable subject, but more profitable, I hope, and I will leave its humanitarian, its eleemosynary points for the consideration of gentlemen on the other side of the House, whose new-born affection for the black man renders it entirely safe to do so. I propose only to give attention to its bearing upon the war.

Power is virtue in a belligerent. A nation at war ought to strengthen itself in every possible way, or give up the strife. It is worse than folly, it is criminal, to protract a deadly conflict unnecessarily.

This bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs proposes, in effect, to shorten the war. The means of doing it are within our reach; the duty is before us, and we are called upon to act.

The reasons for employing colored men in the military service of the Government, and especially such colored men as are or have been in slavery, are to my mind overwhelming, and I feel constrained to urge extraordinary measures, if necessary, to obtain such service. The bill under consideration must have a powerful tendency to promote this object, and ought therefore to find the favor of loyal men. I choose to consider it from this point of view, because the exigencies of an active, long-continued, and still vigorous rebellion are upon us. In peace times I should consider it in altogether a different light.

The bill provides for the taking in charge by the War Department of the freed people of the country, "to the end that said freedmen and the Government of the United States shall be mutually protected, and their respective rights and interests duly determined and maintained." This I understand to mean that when these people, like any other people, are needed by the Government, so many of them as are fit to bear arms may be thus employed. At all events, there is nothing in the bill to prevent such employment of them, and there appears to be great propriety in giving their supervision to the War Department, at least during the war, rather than to the Department of the Interior, or even to the proposed new Department of Industry, because they can then with greater facility be called into the military service of the Government whenever an emergency might require it.

I do not favor this feature of the measure because of any inability on the part of our white soldiers to maintain themselves. They have done this to the full extent of every reasonable expectation. They have driven in the rebellion on every hand, and routed the minions of treason from many a stronghold. Every fair contest in this war has shown that "Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just;

And he but naked, though locked up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted."

Viewed as a question of expediency, the argument in favor of a colored soldiery is none the less. If the Republic possessed ten times the astounding strength it has already displayed, and if the usurpation at Richmond were much weaker than it has ever appeared to be, still should we employ this agency in sustaining the former and crushing the latter. As Republicans we should certainly favor it, as Democrats should we favor it, and as abolitionists especially should we favor it. It is a matter that appeals directly to our philanthropy. It involves the interests not of this country alone, but of all countries; not of the living merely, but of all generations. It will most surely uproot and destroy slavery from the face of the earth. The example will not be lost upon the only American monarchy, slaveholding Brazil, nor upon the few Spanish American colonies that still foster the barbarous practice of chattelizing humanity. Carry into practice the provisions of this bill, and the New World, at least, will be free again as when first created, and all men be permitted to pursue their own happiness here unmolested by tyrants.

It would be unfair to leave this childlike people uncared for while the stalwart among them are fighting the battles of liberty for us as well as themselves; and equally so to turn them off upon the cold charities of a dominant race after the battles are over. Under the proclamation of the President they became the wards of the Republic, and we cannot, with any show of justice, disclaim the guardianship. Dispel the clouds and darkness that villainous local laws have imposed upon their minds, and they will no longer need our care.

It will not be possible, in the short time allotted, to revert to all the arguments in favor of this bill, but some of the reasons for it are so patent as to force themselves upon attention. While the scheme will much alleviate the new condition of self-reliance of these people, it will impose no new burdens upon the Government; on the contrary, it promises to yield a handsome revenue to the public Treasury. At the same time, and above all, it will so strengthen the national arm as to speedily crush out the rebellion. To this war view of the subject alone, then, I propose to address my remarks, for these are war times.

Contrary to the general opinion entertained two years ago, or less, the American descendants of the African make excellent soldiers. This has been demonstrated on numerous battle-fields, and in some of the most desperate hand-to-hand conflicts of this war. The testimony of officers over them is full and singularly uniform on this point. Only the other day, in the Chronicle of this city, was the following:

"General M. M. Crocker, of Iowa, one of the very best officers in the Army, who early entered the public service, and was an unwavering and leading Democrat in that State for many years, writes from Vicksburg, where he is now stationed, to a friend in Des Moines, under date of January 12, 1864, as follows: 'The negro regiments now form quite an element in this army, and it is astonishing how completely all prejudice on that subject has been done away with. They make good soldiers—mild, good-natured, and respectful to their officers—easily managed, and, as far as they have been tried, fight as well as any troops.'"

And so, whether the testimony come from Vicksburg, Port Hudson, or before Charleston, from Louisiana, Tennessee, or North Carolina; whether from the general who has been taught from his infancy to despise the negro, or from him whose faith in humanity was imbibed from the Puritans, it is the same. Few of these people comparatively have been put under arms in this contest, and they but recently, yet have they achieved for themselves a new, and certainly a brilliant, reputation. We were told they had been known to fight well under other flags, and that regiments of them had become famous in the wars of the East and also the West Indies; but they were not counted upon to sustain "the flag of our Union." Our excessively chivalrous Democratic friends were horrified at the bare idea of arming in defense of the nation what they were pleased to term property, and it was only when drafting approached too closely that they could see any virtue in it. So scrupulous are some of them on this question of color that they have hitherto strenuously declined the use of colored powder as against rebels.

It is a favorite theory among persons educated at the Military Academy that all men under similar circumstances of discipline and physical condition are about equally brave; that if there is any difference it is owing to the bodily and not to the mental structure of the individual. And pleasant it is to find in that school of theories one theory that is so nearly sustained by the experiences of this war. What with his physical training and discipline to obedience, the colored man will fight, and as bravely, I trust, as his white companion in arms. There is one characteristic about these people that eminently fits them for the sternest realities of war. They manifest more sympathy toward each other than do the white soldiers, and, as a consequence, instead of scattering they become gregarious in time of danger, and maintain the strength that is always found in union. They seldom, if ever, abandon their comrades in distress. During the many expeditions that our soldiers have made within the rebel lines, this peculiarity of the colored population has been observed. The aged, the infirm, and the helpless young have been the objects of their chiefest solicitude while escaping from bondage. Often in this war has the flight of Virgil's hero been illustrated. Many a swarthy Æneas has borne away upon his shoulder some old Anchises, while leading his little Ascanius by the hand, followed by his faithful wife carrying a little bundle, the household lares and penates, from the cruel confederacy.

Another reason for strengthening the military arm of the Government by the employment of this agency, is that the slaves join the Union forces with alacrity whenever an opportunity offers. This is not regarded by them as a political contest, and party feeling never intervenes between them and duty. Convince the freedman of the rebellious States that downtrodden humanity needs his assistance, and at once he seizes his weapon and goes into the ranks. Instances are related where they have resorted to the most ingenious expedients to conceal physical defects in order to get into the Army; and they have wept with disappointment over the adverse decision of an examining physician, so anxious have they been for immolation upon the holy altar of liberty. Here is patriotism, here an appreciation of that old Roman adage—"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori."

But the freedmen of the South are better fitted by nature and habit than the northern people to endure the climate of the insurgent States, and the toils incident to the life of a soldier therein. This is attested in many ways, but in none more forcibly and sadly than by the hecatombs filled with noble young men who perished in the swamps of the Chickahominy, victims not more of the climate than of the sickly sentimentality of that miserable specimen of a general whose chief solicitude while leading a patriot army was to guard rebel property and return fugitive slaves.

Colored soldiers will meet with the sympathy and most hearty coöperation of the entire colored population of the South; and if it is demonstrated by a solemn act of Congress that their hitherto downtrodden race is to be lifted up and be made the recipients of national kindness, the white soldiers that are assisting to bear aloft the American flag will be equally welcome among them. This will give to the Union forces an advantage that has probably not been so fully enjoyed by an army in an enemy's country since the world began. It is an advantage that cannot be overestimated. Why, the idea of an invasion by these people is terribly discomfiting to the usurpers, and hence their desperate exertions to deter us from obtaining their aid by indiscriminately murdering all negroes found under arms or in the uniform of the United States, as also the officers that lead them. Their most barbarous treatment of our poor friends in the Richmond prisons is instigated by their fears upon this point. They dare not recognize their former slaves as soldiers to be treated according to the rules and laws of war. The weapon in the hand of the slave is truly the Ithuriel spear; the rebellion writhes under its touch. An army of colored men becomes an army of liberators in every sense, and if you would put a speedy termination to this war, this awful war, arm so many of these people as will bear arms, and take good care of the balance. Ay, sir, put one of John Brown's pikes in the hands of every traitor's slave and let him earn his liberty. Men that would not be content with all the choicest blessings of the Republic are unfit to live in it. Let them perish. Mercy to them is cruelty toward God and humanity. Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad, and though these people are beside themselves, yet are they sensitive to danger. They fear the men they have scourged in the pride of their power. The maned lion is not more dreaded by the lonely traveler in Africa than is he whose fathers destroyed the lion by the trembling despots at Richmond.

Every slave added to the Union Army is, in effect, also taking a soldier from the ranks of the rebels. The efficiency of an army depends upon how it is fed, clothed, and furnished. Without supplies it will fall to pieces in three days; and the man at home laboring for its support is as indispensable to its strength as the one that carries the musket. The plow is equally useful to the belligerent with the gun, and the sickle with the saber. The ex-Secretary of War and his cohorts are so hotly pressed to maintain their ascendancy that they have ordered into their service, as we are told, all able-bodied white men within their lines between the ages of eighteen and sixty; and the rebellion will therefore soon be utterly dependent upon slave labor for its support. By so much, then, as you withdraw this support, by so much do you weaken the rebellion. And this, it seems to me, presents one of the most powerful inducements for the Government to use all available means to enlist colored persons in its service, and to withdraw their support from the rebellion.

But there is still another argument. Those ingrates who hold nightly carnival at Richmond over the wasted victims of famine, and whose requital for support long rendered is torture and death—these fiends in human shape have already entailed upon this Government, which they cannot destroy, an enormous public debt; and it is a matter of the first importance to prevent as far as possible its augmentation; and among the liveliest considerations for engaging the colored man in the Army is that it is great economy to do so.

The African's powers of endurance, whether in marching under a southern sun or laboring in intrenchments, surpasses that of the white man, and as a consequence his sanitary condition is better. So far as I have been able to gather facts, it excels that of the white soldiers in the proportion of five to one.

It has been stated—I do not vouch for the fact, for I have not the data before me—that since this war began as many of the Union soldiers have perished from disease and hardship as in battle. If this be true, or nearly true, it furnishes another strong argument to the point under consideration. Besides the hardiness and prudence of the colored soldier, he possesses a most commendable aptness for subsisting himself in an enemy's country. The training he has received, in many instances from niggardly masters, eminently fits him for this important duty.

But there is another point of view from which it will appear to be great economy to employ slaves as soldiers. A sufficient and satisfactory bounty for them, if we offer them no more, is their freedom and that of their race. They demand no further subsidy than the privilege of vindicating their rights, their "inalienable rights," of life, liberty, and labor. And shall we not accord them this poor privilege? Rather, shall we not avail ourselves of an opportunity to save millions upon millions which otherwise would need to be paid as bounties in order to keep filled our serried ranks? The aid of the bondman to humble or destroy his and our own would-be proud oppressor can be obtained without the expensive routine of the enrollment and draft; and it shames me that he whose participation in the blessings of the Republic has been so limited should be among the foremost in its defense.

Another fact must not be overlooked. Desertions rarely occur among the colored troops.

From the general framework of our military laws, one is forced to the conclusion that it has been the purpose of the country to fill up and keep up the armies from other sources, and quite independently of the slaves.

The enrollment act as it now stands reads, "all able-bodied male citizens of the United States" shall be liable to do military duty; and this in the face of the fact that colored people are not counted citizens, certainly not in the States where slavery is now or was lately practiced. So that this class of people have been virtually excluded from military duty under the law. And in the amended bill that passed this House on Saturday last you have incorporated a provision making them a part of the national forces; but you declare that the usual bounty payable to the drafted man shall not be paid to the colored soldier when drafted, nor to his family, but to a third party, even to the man to whom that same soldier has, upon compulsion, rendered the service of a lifetime. What justice, what logic, in such a law? It is the old justice of the slavemonger. It is the logic of the tyrant; and shall we never rise above them? Must our Republic be further scourged with bloody thongs before we can do right?

There is little room for disagreement among loyal men upon the proposition that our Army ought to be increased; and is this policy of discouraging enlistments with a whole class to be continued, even by implication? Such certainly will be the just inference if we now fail to adopt the provisions of this act for a Freedmen's Bureau. Do gentlemen suppose that we have already enough colored troops in our Army, and that we need no more of them? Or has the cruelty of the rebels toward these men deterred the Congress from tendering an equal provision to avail ourselves of their further assistance? Would the traitors, think you, forbear to make use of such an agency if they had it within their reach? While they dare not put arms in the hands of slaves, they are nevertheless conscripting them to labor on fortifications. In the Globe of but the other day was a statement that Extra Billy Smith, now Governor of old Virginia, lately of California, and an exceedingly anxious candidate for United States Senator from there, had ordered a draft for five thousand slaves in certain counties, to work on fortifications. Neither General Smith nor any other traitor has any scruples about this matter.

As to the feasibility of obtaining colored recruits, it is preposterous to deny it. We have already, according to reports, some fifty to a hundred thousand of them in the school of the soldier or under arms. Nearly all of these are from within the rebel lines, and there are full half a million more of them there precisely in the predicament of so many prisoners, scattered over half a million square miles, surrounded by an imaginary wall thousands of miles in extent. Only encourage their coming forth, and the entire rebel army, though it had no other duty, would present but a feeble barrier to their escape.

It is gratifying to know that some of our officers have a keen appreciation of the advantages to flow from this arm of the service; and among them, as worthy of mention, is that live man, who fully understands the rebel character and comprehends the emergency, Major General Butler. How far they are to be supported and encouraged by the Government rests with this Congress, and that is the question.

There is too much of the chivalrous spirit of McClellan and Porter and Paterson in the Army yet; too much of West Point punctilio, and too little of earnest determination to conquer. Unless this nation awakes to the emergency, and takes hold of the instrumentalities that God in His wisdom has provided, this usurpation will not be put down.

The people have not yet fully made up their minds that slavery, the Jonah of our ship, must go overboard. Gentlemen on the other side of the House seem exceedingly anxious to save some remnants of it; and if for that end they will discourage the enlistment of white men, much more may they be expected to oppose the enlistment of negroes, which at once strikes at the root of slavery and saps the foundation of their party. It will require greater audacity than most of the gentlemen on that side of the House possess to return to slavery a man after he has fought for his country.

In my judgment, this war is not nearly over. It possesses a most dangerous element of desperation; and unless you are willing to totally discard the policy that at first and for a long time controlled it, by arming the slaves, you will not see the end. Already a thousand days and nights have the people waited and watched, but peace has not come. Hope has frequently brought it to our doors, but like a phantom has it fled again. Self-delusion may be a pleasant, but it is a most unprofitable business. Armies will move in the spring; other battles will be fought, and fields now unnamed will become noted in the history of this war. Its greatest hero is perhaps still unknown to fame. You may depend upon it, peace has been already postponed by our acting upon the belief that it is near. We have turned aside to discuss the rights of traitors, to the forgetfulness of the more important rights of humanity. The so-called rights of rebellious States have received a great deal of attention at our hands already, and all to no purpose, unless you first put an end to the rule of the slavemongers there.

This that we are dealing with is in no proper sense a rebellion as understood in this day. It is a most impudent usurpation of power by a little junto of men who had been too long trusted by the people. From the very commencement they have maintained themselves by military rule, and in no other manner. They have entirely discarded the plainly expressed will of the nation, and boldly undertaken to subvert free government. The wonder is—if there be anything wonderful under the sun—that they should have had the unbridled audacity to undertake this thing while professing to be Democrats, and to respect republican institutions. But to the philosopher this may not seem strange.

The contest between truth and error is not less active now than at any former period of the world's history. It is said, truth crushed to earth will rise again; and the same should be said of error, for it is constantly putting on new habiliments, the better to appeal to the passions of men. In fact, nothing has yet appeared upon earth, however good, wise, just, or beneficent, but it has met with opposition. Persecutions did not begin in the case of John Brown of Ossawatimie. Even he in whom both Jew and Gentile now concede there was no guile was pursued, persecuted, and crucified in his own country. Galileo was forced to disavow his sublime theory of the planetary motions. Socrates the Just, was made to drink the fatal hemlock. Religion, science, literature, law, government, have advanced through strifes, contentions, blood. As a general rule, the greater the virtue the more violent the assaults upon it. And our glorious Republic constitutes no exception: its destruction is sought, and no cause whatever is alleged by its assailants for their wicked course.

Apologists for crime have always been found; and this great crime, this crime against the whole human race, this crime, scarcely second in magnitude to the crucifixion, does not lack its apologists. They are found everywhere, even in this Capitol. But no traitor, no abettor of treason, has had the temerity to charge any wrong against the Government of the United States. On the contrary, up to the very moment of the breaking out of the rebellion, it was proclaimed by men of all parties, and everywhere, to be the wisest, the best, most just and beneficent Government that had ever been established in the world. And none were so loud in these declarations as were the very persons who for the last three years have been trying to overthrow it; and none had enjoyed its blessings to so great a degree.

Alexander H. Stephens, lately a member upon this floor, and now the usurping vice president, addressed a convention in his own State of Georgia, after the rebellion was inaugurated, and made use of the following language:

"Pause, I intreat you, and consider for a moment what reasons you can give that will even satisfy yourselves in calmer moments; what reasons you can give to your fellow-sufferers in the calamity that it will bring upon us. What reasons can you give to the nations of the earth to justify it? They will be the calm and deliberate judges in the case; and to what cause or one overt act can you name or point on which to rest the plea of justification? What right has the North assailed? What interest of the South has been invaded? What justice has been denied? And what claim founded in justice and right has been withheld? Can either of you to-day name one governmental act of wrong, deliberately and purposely done by the Government of Washington, of which the South has a right to complain? I challenge the answer." * * * "Leaving out of view, for the present, the countless millions of dollars you must expend in a war with the North; with tens of thousands of your sons and brothers slain in battle, and offered up as sacrifices upon the altar of your ambition—and for what, we ask again? Is it for the overthrow of the American Government, established by our common ancestry, cemented and built up by their sweat and blood, and founded on the broad principles of right, justice, and humanity? And, as such, I must declare here, as I have often done before, and which has been repeated by the greatest and wisest statesmen and patriots in this and other lands, that it is the best and freest Government; the most equal in its rights; the most just in its decisions; the most lenient in its measures; and the most inspiring in its principles to elevate the race of men that the sun of heaven ever shone upon."

No parallel for this rebellion can be found in history. The conspiracy of Catiline approximates it most closely; but the Government against which he plotted possessed few of the excellencies of our own. In one particular have our American traitors faithfully copied after their Roman exemplar. They sought to destroy the Republic while yet intrusted with its affairs; and as with Catiline, so with our modern conspirators, ingratitude is conspicuous among their crimes.

While history furnishes no parallel to the rebellion of Jeff. Davis and his coadjutors, we are not without a picture of their perfidy, for which we are indebted to the genius of that great English republican and poet, Milton. He has shown us how Satan and his followers—a motley crew—rebelled against the authority of Heaven, and for precisely the reason that they were not permitted to control there. They preferred to rule in hell rather than serve in heaven. And so with our late ex-President, our ex-Vice President, ex-heads of Departments, Senators, members of Congress, ministers to foreign courts, ambassadors, consuls, and dignitaries in large number, who hover about the slave-pens of Richmond, and make their headquarters there. Forgetting entirely the source whence was derived all the authority they ever had, they discard the verdict of their masters, the people, and set up for themselves an empire founded upon slavery; even upon slavery possessed of all the most repulsive and forbidding features of that heathenish practice; a slavery that ever drips with human blood, and fills the whole air with the groans of its victims.

Such is the acknowledged corner-stone of that empire; and are there any that would not relieve these victims from such masters? Ours is the home of the oppressed of all lands, and shall it afford no relief to the oppressed of our own? A shame that we have so long belied our professions! A shame and a disgrace that the great American Republic should suffer its free Constitution to be made the bulwark of tyranny! We have tolerated this fallacy of one man owning another too long. It is utterly indefensible on any ground, and will bring trouble upon any people that adopt it. There is a principle of compensation running through all nature that will not permit the violation of a law with impunity. The reverse tide may be slow, but it is sure to come. I doubt not the next generation of people in Kentucky will wonder that their distinguished Representative on this floor, [Mr. CLAY,] in the third year of this slaveholders' rebellion, should talk so confidently about property in man. Why, it is self-evident that liberty is an inalienable right, no matter what custom may happen to prevail in the border States, or in the Barbary States, or in any other States.

Gentlemen are constantly reverting to some old condition of things, and claiming that we should shape our conduct by what some others have said or done here or elsewhere under other circumstances. As for me, sir, I have no more regard for precedents in these times than had our colonial ancestors when they declared the great truth that "all men are created equal." They had the courage thus to strike down the ancient theoretical distinctions of blood. All the notions of all the nations in all the centuries touching royalty and nobility were swept from the New World on the 4th of July, 1776, and the Old World is learning the lesson slowly. Precedent is only respectable when it accords with right reason. No matter how many examples may be cited to sustain slavery, men are now looking at it in the light of reason. Its pangs are not at all alleviated because of the multitudes that have suffered them.

"Slavery, thou art a bitter draught;
And though thousands in all ages
Have been made to drink of thee,
Thou art no less bitter on that account."

In the United States of America slavery has forfeited every semblance of right to recognition; and I regret that our worthy President has seen fit since this war began to give it any countenance in his public acts. The proclamation would have been still more palatable had it contained only the words, "Slavery has undertaken to destroy the Republic, therefore slavery shall be destroyed. Done: Abraham Lincoln."

Mr. Speaker, if you would put an end to this cruel war be sure in good faith to take good care of these oppressed people. Arm the men. Put sharp weapons in every brawny hand among them; and then soon will the ex-Secretary of War cry out to his followers, in the language of his great prototype:

"Long is the way,
And hard, that out of hell leads up to light."

Mr. KALBFLEISCH obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

WAGON ROAD IN IOWA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a wagon road from the Missouri river, by way of Neabralle, to Virginia City, in the Territory of Idaho.

TRANSFER OF MEN.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a joint resolution (S. No. 28) relative to the transfer of men from the military service to the naval service.

Objection was made.

Mr. HIGBY. If gentlemen will hear my reasons, I think they will not object. The object of the resolution is to give power to the Executive to transfer men to such war vessels as are now without men, that they may be sent immediately to California and the Pacific coast. It is an absolute necessity that this should be done. The quicker it is done the sooner the Government can act.

Mr. COX. I must object. The bill ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DEMING. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with leave to report to-morrow morning.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to that.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

SUBSTITUTES AND RECRUITS.

Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to prevent substitute and recruiting brokers from purchasing substitutes and recruits from one township, ward, or district, to be credited to the quota of another; and report by bill or otherwise.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to change the name of the American-built schooner Starlight to that of Joseph Brady; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The motion I made to adjourn over was not put in the way I made it. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Such a motion is not in order. The House cannot decide to-day what it will do to-morrow.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at forty-five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 19, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. S. D. BURCHARD, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river to Lake Superior. As the committee have already reported on the subject I move that the memorial be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the early payment of the damages sustained by citizens of that State by the Sioux Indian war of 1862 out of the property of the destroyers now under the control of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the erection of a line of military posts from Fort Abercrombie, in Dakota Territory, to Bannock City, in Idaho Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented three memorials of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the establishment of mail routes from Carver via Waconia to Wattertown; from Hastings via Empire City, Farmington, and Lakeville, to Shakopee in Scott county; and from Faxon via Glencoe and Koniska, to Hutchinson, McLeod county, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of allowing pensions to the widows of chaplains and surgeons in the Army who may die while in the service of the United States; and in favor of the construction of a ship canal from the lakes to the Mississippi river, and the improvement of the upper and lower rapids of that river; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of Horace Binney and others of Philadelphia, praying that such a tax may be imposed upon the circulation of banks chartered by State Legislatures as will compel them to call in all their issues, and insure a uniform national currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 206) in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals;

A joint resolution (No. 31) making appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States; and

A joint resolution (No. 36) to construe the third section of the act approved July 17, 1863, entitled "An act to amend the act calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, approved February 28, 1795, and the act amendatory thereof, and for other purposes," so as to provide for the payment of bounties to all classes of troops called out under the provisions of that section.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 73) to enable the trustees of Blue Mont College to perfect the title to their lands, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburg, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred copies of the report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration. The printing will cost ten dollars.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Interior Department five hundred copies of the report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct.

CASE OF H. C. DE ALMA.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Charles De Alma, have directed me to ask that they be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. It does not seem to be a proper petition to be referred to the Committee on Claims.

This man does not ask any pay for anything, but he complains that he has been grievously misused by the Senate in being rejected as a brigadier, and by General Halleck, who he says has prevented him from gaining distinction in the Army or an honorable death; and he asks that the Committee on Military Affairs may be directed to inquire into it. The Committee on Claims have no objection to his getting an honorable death at their hands, if he desires it. [Laughter.] So we ask to be discharged, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for a division of that question so that we may vote first on discharging the committee and then on the question whether such a petition ought to be received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A division being called for, the first question is on the motion to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of this petition.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move that the petition be indefinitely postponed. It is a petition here remonstrating against the action of the Senate in executive session. It ought not to be received.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The petition goes a little further. The petitioner complains of his treatment before he got to the Senate, and he wants the Senate Military Committee to investigate it. The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report the following resolution, and to ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be and they are hereby authorized to hear and report upon the claim of Joseph C. G. Kennedy relative to his salary as secretary of the Census Board and superintending clerk on the census.

Mr. HALE. Let that lie over. It is an important matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is merely to take jurisdiction.

Mr. HALE. I know that.

Mr. ANTHONY. The claim is before the committee, and the committee had a little doubt whether it did not require a resolution to enable them to take jurisdiction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not admit of debate if objection is made.

Mr. HALE. I will let it be considered now, but I want to say that I was so much impressed with the suggestions made by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] the other day in regard to Brown's case that he entirely converted me as to the impropriety of taking these things from the Court of Claims, and taking cognizance of them in the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very sorry the Senator from New Hampshire did not give me the benefit of his vote immediately after his conversion. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. I will simply say to the Senate that this case involves no question of fact, but merely the construction of a law, so that it is unnecessary to take any testimony before the court.

Mr. HALE. I confess the longer I think of what the Senator from Connecticut said, the more I am impressed with it, and the only reason why I did not give him the benefit of my vote the other day—and I say this in all faith—was that I thought that was so clear a case that it did not require any further investigation; but I think on the whole the precedent is a bad one; it led us into difficulty then, and I guess we had better adhere to the law.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the judgment of the committee will be accepted by the Senate. The committee ask for this.

The resolution was rejected—ayes seven, noes not counted.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: I desire to make a privileged motion. I voted with the majority on the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, and after an explanation of his I am satisfied that it may possibly work injustice. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to authorize the Committee on Claims to take cognizance of Mr. Kennedy's claim.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia:

A bill (No. 206) in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals; and

A joint resolution (No. 36) to construe the third section of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to amend the act calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, approved February 28, 1795, and the act amendatory thereof, and for other purposes," so as to provide for the payment of bounties to all classes of troops called out under the provisions of that section.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for an appropriation for the erection of a post office and court-house building at the seat of government of the State of Kansas.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 127) to authorize the transfer of indictments from the district to the circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 128) to provide for the renting of abandoned lands, tenements, and houses in insurrectionary States, and for the care and employment of persons therein set free by proclamation of the President; which was read twice by its title, referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 129) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the corporation of Georgetown in the District of Columbia to lay and collect a water tax, and for other purposes," approved May 21, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NAVY-YARD AT NEWCASTLE.

Mr. RIDDLE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of establishing a navy-yard at or near the town of Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, and to report to the Senate the relative convenience and public advantages of that location compared with others on the Delaware river.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. President, I shall not make a speech on this subject, but I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the fact that the great States of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts have made a stronger speech for this location as a naval depot than I can make by constructing their railroads to Newcastle in preference to the different sites which have been indicated in the State of Pennsylvania. I merely mention this matter to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the fact that the great coal depot and iron exportation depot is at the town of Newcastle, in preference to League island, Marcus Hook, or Chester, which places they have to pass to get to Newcastle, and that the roads leading there have been constructed by the people of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore, Philadelphia and Reading, and Pennsylvania Central railroads. When the proper time comes, I shall, perhaps, discuss the matter further. I hope the resolution will be adopted now, that the Committee on Naval Affairs may make the inquiry.

The resolution was agreed to.

TAXES ON GOVERNMENT LANDS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a little joint resolution on the table that would properly go to the Committee on Finance; but it is very important to pass it at once. I think there can be no possible objection to it, and as it is a pressing matter I wish to have it passed at once.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) making appropriation for the payment of taxes on certain lands owned by the United States was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $20,000 to pay taxes on lands owned by the United States, and to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress upon what lands the taxes may be paid and the amount paid.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A majority of the Committee on Finance have seen the resolution and recommend its passage. I send to the Chair a short letter which I desire to have read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

SOLICITOR'S OFFICE, January 27, 1864.

SIR: There is a large quantity of real estate held by this office or by trustees in trust for the United States which has been acquired either in satisfaction or as security for debts due to the Government, upon which State and other taxes have accrued, and for the payment of which no provision has been made by law. For want of this the rights of the Government are in danger in some cases of being seriously embarrassed, if not entirely lost. I respectfully recommend that Congress be asked to make an appropriation for this purpose. I think that the sum of $20,000 should be appropriated, and the appropriation should be made as speedily as practicable, as there are some cases in which any considerable delay in the payment of the taxes would prove very inconvenient.

I have the honor to be, with high respect,

EDWARD JORDAN,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Hon. S. P. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference upon the enrollment bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report of the committee of conference will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 36) "to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863," having met, after full and free conference do report as follows:

And that the Senate do agree to the said several amendments.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the fourth section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. After the word "time," in the sixth line of said section, insert the words "previous to the draft." 2. Strike out the words "three years," in the tenth line of said section, and insert the words "the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted" in lieu thereof. 4. Strike out all of said section after the word "years," in the tenth line thereof. And that the Senate do agree to the said several amendments.

Strike out the words "enrolled and" in the first line of said section. 2. After the word "may," in the second line of said section, insert the words "before the time fixed for his appearance for duty at the draft rendezvous." 3. Strike out all of said section after the word "draft," in the twenty-fourth line, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "in filling that quota; and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procurement of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year, in every such case, the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section." And that the Senate agree to the said several amendments.

That the sixth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the seventh section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out.

That the eighth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the fifth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the ninth section of the bill of the Senate be stricken out, and that the Senate do agree to the ninth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. Strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War," in the twentieth and twenty-first lines, and insert the words "President of the United States" in lieu thereof. And that the House of Representatives agree to the said several amendments.

That the House of Representatives do agree to the tenth section of the bill of the Senate, with the following amendments, to wit: 1. After the word "able," in the second line of said section, insert the words "or ordinary." 2. Strike out the word "or," where it first occurs in the fifth line of said section. 3. HENRY WILSON,
J. W. NESMITH,
J. W. GRIMES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT SCHENCK,
HENRY C. DEMING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUMNER. I observe in one case an error either of the pen or of the type. One item of the report proposes to strike out the word "the," in line sixteen of the twenty-sixth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives, and insert the word "a" in lieu of it. The word "the" is in the fifteenth and not the sixteenth line of that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have looked over the bill, and I see that the report follows the paging of the original bill.

Mr. WILSON. Of the manuscript copy.

Mr. SUMNER. I have made several marks of the kind I have just stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. So it is all the way through. You can tell nothing from this report.

Mr. WILSON. The numbers are according to the manuscript copy, and not according to the printed bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have before us the printed bills; but these amendments are based on the manuscript bills.

Mr. SUMNER. Following the printed copy, I observe several discrepancies. If it is all right in the manuscript, I do not know the use of saying anything about it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We have been compelled to examine this bill so hastily that I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what change, if any, is made in the commutation required by the Senate bill? Does this change the rate of commutation?

Mr. WILSON. It reduces it from $400 to $300.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask one further question. I understand that will exempt the party for one year, and no longer.

Mr. WILSON. The Senate provided in the bill that the commutation should be $400, and that the person paying commutation should be subject to the next call. The House of Representatives reduced the sum from $400 to $300; and provided that the name of the person paying commutation should not be placed in the box and be liable to be drafted again until the entire list in the box had been drawn out. That seemed to be a bounty to pay the commutation as against getting substitutes, because if a man got a substitute and the substitute was liable to duty and was drafted in the next draft, then he had to go; and of course a man would not procure a substitute, but would pay the money under those circumstances. The time, therefore, was agreed upon to be one year. The payment of commutation will exempt for one year under this report.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are one or two radical changes in this bill which I should like to have explained. It is a very important bill. I very rarely make any objection to the report of a committee of conference, because I know they have great difficulties to overcome. They must yield as a matter of course, there being differences between the two Houses. But I should like to know if there was any reason given in the committee for striking out the sixth section of the Senate bill? I will state, before the Senator from Massachusetts answers, that the fifth section also has been very materially modified, and I do not think it has been at all improved, by inserting this clause at the end of the section:

And his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person on account of his payment of commutation money for the procurement of a substitute extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year, in every such case, the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section.

Under the operation of the bill as it is amended, if a person pays commutation money it exempts him from service for one year. Under the bill as it passed the Senate, it exempted him from service only during that call; so that the result of the conference has been to give a greater effect to the payment of commutation money than was given to it by the Senate bill, if I understand it correctly.

The sixth section was carefully considered in the Senate, and was inserted by a very full vote, almost a unanimous vote, and I see no reason for striking it out:

That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procurement of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota.

And then it requires each State and each district of a State to proceed with the draft to fill its quota. This is the only provision in the bill which compels each State to fill its quota. If you strike out the sixth section of the bill the payment of the commutation money by any of the States would relieve that State from the draft for one year, and in the mean time the draft would go on and be enforced in the other States which do not pay the commutation money. Under the operations of this bill any State might pay the entire commutation money, and thus be relieved from the draft without furnishing a single soldier. It seems to me, unless there is some good reason for it, this should not be adopted. It is a radical change of the law; and in certain districts and communities it may defeat the draft, as has been done under the old law. I should like to understand why that section is stricken out, and also the seventh section; but that is not so material.

I notice also that several sections of the Senate bill are stricken out, and other sections of the House bill which relate to different matters are inserted. It is very difficult to understand it without having the whole bill before us as it will be if this report shall be concurred in. It seems to me that in the printing of this bill, it should have been printed as it will stand if it passes in the form recommended by the committee of conference. As it is printed now we cannot understand it. The references to the pages and lines refer to the manuscript copy, and not to the printed copy. It is impossible for any one to understand this important committee of conference without a great deal of labor, and doing what the printers might have done by printing it as it will stand in case we adopt the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the House of Representatives struck out the sixth section of the Senate bill. It will be remembered that that section was offered by three Senators, and was made up here in the Senate. The different portions of the sections are retained in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Senator refer to them.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I will read a portion of it in an amendment made by the committee to the third section. In the report of the committee of conference, on page 32, the Senator will find the following:

10. After the word "county," in the end of said section, add the following: "And if the quota of any district shall not be filled by the draft made in accordance with the provisions of this act and the act to which it is an amendment, further drafts shall be made, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled."

That provision is secured. As to the seventh section, the House struck that out, and the Senate committee agreed to it for the reason that it is already in the old law and there is no need for it here. It is merely surplusage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator where the committee have inserted this provision of the sixth section:

That colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States in any State shall not be credited upon the quota of any other State.

Where is that inserted; or is it inserted at all?

Mr. WILSON. The committee of conference propose to amend the twenty-sixth section of the bill of the House of Representatives by adding the following:

But men of color, drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States, or subdivisions of States, wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as the United States colored volunteers.

They are to be credited where they belong.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is to preserve in some form the features of the sixth section. As the Senator says they are preserved, I have no objection to the report.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Iowa has the bill made up this morning just as it will be when the report of the committee of conference shall be adopted, and I assure the Senator he will find it correct.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I wish to state at this stage of the proceedings, as it may be as appropriate now as at any other time, that although there are many things in this enrollment bill which I favor, I cannot consistently with my sense of public duty vote for any conscription law that retains the commutation clause in any form. Hence I shall vote against concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I shall reluctantly vote against concurrence in the report of this committee of conference. There are some things in this report that I should be very glad to vote for; but the position assumed by the Senator from Indiana meets my concurrence. I voted with him on the subject of commutation when the bill was before the Senate, and I have seen no reason to change my opinion on that subject. I do not believe the House of Representatives have added anything to strengthen this bill in the way of procuring soldiers for our armies. I believe their amendments will have the other effect.

The twenty-sixth section of the amendment of the House of Representatives, which provided for the mustering in of persons of African descent, has been amended and somewhat improved by the committee of conference, but still it contains provisions that I cannot support. It provides that we shall go into the State of Kentucky, for instance, and muster in the slaves of loyal and disloyal masters alike, and it proposes to pay from the Treasury of the country $300 apiece for those slaves if they are claimed by loyal masters; and then it proposes to credit these slaves, which the people pay for, to the quota of that particular State. In other words, it proposes to call on the people of Minnesota to furnish her troops, and then whatever money certain of her citizens may pay by way of commutation is to be taken and paid to the slaveholder for his slave, and the State is to be credited with that slave.

I believe that this is wrong in principle. I believe that these slaves owe service to the country just as much as the apprentice or the minor boy. You take the apprentice boy in Massachusetts eighteen years of age and deprive his master of three years' service without paying him one cent. You take the son of the aged father, who is dependent on the service of his son for support, and force him at eighteen years of age into the Army without paying that father. I never will consent to turn round and pay another class of men for the services of their slaves who owe service to the Government just as much as the apprentice or the minor boy.

Besides, you provide for paying for these slaves more than they are worth, admitting that their masters ought to be paid at all. Why, sir, in a year and a half from now the slaves of Maryland and of Kentucky, in my humble judgment, will not be worth one cent, and they cannot be made valuable for one cent; for I believe slavery is going by the board. While the people of the free States are taxed as they have been, and while the resources of the North have been invoked as they have been, I am unwilling that the fund which is raised in the North by the payment of commutation shall be carried down to these slave States for the purpose of compensating the loyal or disloyal masters of slaves.

I will state that there is one great advance made in this bill. It provides that the slave on being mustered in shall be free; but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] said the other day that the bare fact of mustering them into the service freed them. I shall vote against the report.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not think it requisite on every occasion for a Senator to give the reasons of his vote; and yet after the remark that has been made by the Senator from Indiana, I wish to say one word simply.

I feel very much as he does with respect to the effect of allowing the commutation clause in this bill. I think it will greatly impair the value of the bill and retard the filling up of the Army, which is the great and essential thing. But, sir, if I cannot get the bill exactly in the shape I desire, or in the mode in which I think it will be of the most value, still I do not understand that that should control my action so far as to prevent my voting for the bill. If I cannot get it in the best shape in which I think the necessities of the country require it, I feel as if I ought to go for it in the best shape in which I am able to get it. I have reason to believe that the result of this conference committee has combined as near as possible the general sentiment of both Houses of Congress, and perhaps the general sentiment of the country on the subject.

I think the striking out that exemption clause would have filled up the Army, and filled it up in such a way as would have made the spring campaign a perfect success, and would have terminated this war. I believe that no person in the country who is able to bear arms has a right or would have a right to resist the operation of such a law, stringent as it might be, but required by the stern necessities of the case.

Believing that this bill if it passes in its present shape will go far toward filling up the Army and supplying the requisites required by the opening campaign, I shall give my vote in favor of the report of this committee. In doing so I simply desired to express the reason for my own action, without attempting in any way to reflect on the conduct of others in their action.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise merely to state one or two objections which will induce me to vote against this report of the committee of conference. That report would leave much in the bill that I heartily approve of, but it would leave much that I utterly condemn. In the first place, the first section of the bill is untouched. That section is in these words:

"That the President of the United States shall be authorized, whenever he shall deem it necessary, during the present war, to call for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the public exigencies may require."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Senator will pardon the Chair. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up in the order of business the unfinished business of yesterday at this time.

Mr. WILSON. I move the postponement of that measure and all other orders for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, there is but one power under our Government that is authorized to raise armies, and that power is the Congress of the United States. The first section, to which I object, surrenders that power wholly and unconditionally to the President during the war, to the extent of the whole military population of the United States. I hold that Congress have no power to make any such surrender, and that the Executive has no competency to accept power to raise armies. The President cannot accept or exercise any legislative power. There is but one other concession on the part of Congress to make the power which it yields to the President over the subject of the armies complete; that is also to authorize him to levy the taxes and borrow the money necessary to support the Army. These are all legislative powers, and are required to be exercised by Congress. It must give the operations of raising armies, levying taxes, and borrowing money to support them, the form and completeness of laws, which the President can then execute. Sir, if it is competent for Congress to surrender to the President the uncontrolled power to raise armies in this war to the utmost extent of the population of the United States, it is equally competent for it to surrender to the President the power to support those armies; neither of which can be done.

Another objection that I have to this bill is that it recognizes the enrolling of negro troops, which I hold to be both unconstitutional and impolitic.

A third objection is that it declares the liberation of slaves immediately upon their being mustered into the service of the United States. As I have frequently stated, I hold that this is entirely without the competency and power of Congress.

A fourth objection which I make to the report of the committee is that it is extensive and quite complicated. It is an extensive maze which I have not yet explored, and do not comprehend; and there has been no sufficient time accorded to the Senate to perform that task. I myself, at least—and I suppose it is so with every other member of the Senate except the committee of conference—have to vote on the question of accepting this report entirely in the dark, without the necessary lights or opportunity to obtain those lights by an examination of the bill.

For these reasons I shall vote against the report.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I would have preferred if there had been neither exemption from nor commutation for military service in this bill; but as a bill without these provisions could not be passed, believing that the country demands an enrollment bill of this character, and believing that there is much good to be accomplished by it as it is, I shall waive my objections, and cast my vote for the report of the committee in the performance of my duty to the country.

Mr. GRIMES. As is very well known to the members of the Senate I voted against the passage of this bill when it was originally under consideration in the Senate. The principal reason for thus casting my vote was that which has been assigned by the Senator from Indiana. I was opposed to this commutation clause. But as a member of the conference committee I found it was impossible for us to pass any bill unless I sacrificed some of my personal opinions to the opinions of other gentlemen; and hence, with a good deal of reluctance, I consented to its incorporation into this bill as framed by the committee, and agreed to report it back to the Senate with the modifications that are now contained in it as presented by the committee of conference; that is, reducing the commutation from $400 to $300, and making the exemption continue only for one year in place of the time that was fixed in the original bill.

Mr. President, I also sympathized with the opinions which the Senator from Minnesota has expressed here in relation to the twenty-sixth section of the House bill, which the conference committee has adopted with some modifications. That section, as the bill originally passed the House, provided—

"That all able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person owes service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States, on freeing the person."

It gave an opportunity to the master of the slave to retain him as a slave, notwithstanding he was fighting the battles of the country, and take him back into slavery at the end of the war. The committee of conference modified it so as to declare that this man should be free from the moment he was mustered into the service of the United States. We thus secure the freedom of the man for the payment of $100, and secure a soldier to the Army of the United States. The same provision is extended to those who enlist and to whom the sum of $300 is paid. They are to be free, and cannot afterwards be thrown into slavery.

The Senator from Wisconsin quoted the remark of the Senator from Maryland the other day to the effect that they were free from the moment they were enlisted into the service of the United States. That was not the spirit of the remark made by the Senator from Maryland. He meant to say, I apprehend, that they were virtually free from the moment they were enlisted into the service. They are not actually and de jure free, although they may be de facto free. By this bill we make them both de facto and de jure free; and I submit to the Senator from Minnesota and to all my friends who sympathize with me on this subject that that is accomplishing a great deal.

Mr. President, I can see the hardship of forcing a man's sons into the Army or his apprentice, and not paying him any bounty, when you pay a bounty to the master of a slave; but we cannot carry out all our humanitarian views here in the Senate, or in legislating for the country. We want to fill up the Army; we want to fill it up as rapidly as possible; we want to pass this bill before the 1st of March; we want to prevent any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress, so that it can be immediately put into effect and these men can become efficient for the spring campaign; and hence as a member of the committee I consented to, and as a member of the Senate I shall vote for, some provisions of this bill which are slightly objectionable to me personally. I am not going to allow my personal predilections in regard to any of these questions to control my vote in such a manner as to prevent the armies being replenished under this bill for the spring campaign.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the amendments which have been made by the House of Representatives and accepted by the committee of conference have improved the Senate bill. The bill as it now stands improves the act of last year and makes a more efficient enrollment act. I think that all the features of this bill improve the efficiency of the existing law. It is highly important that it shall be promptly passed, for we must enforce the draft in some portions of the country in order to fill up the ranks of our armies.

The section to which objection is made by the Senator from Minnesota has been improved, as he admits, by the committee of conference. By that section as it passed the House of Representatives, persons held to service or labor drafted or enlisted into the military service were not made free until their masters freed them. Sir, I will not consent to allow any man to wear the uniform of the United States or to follow its flag who is a slave; and this amended section provides that a slave mustered into the service of the United States is free—made free by law on being mustered into that service. I believe that a slave owes higher service to his country than he owes to any man on earth, and that the country has a claim on all her children; and that all who are fit to do military duty, black or white, free or slave, are under obligations to the Government, and the Government has an undoubted right to demand their services. The Government claims and takes our neighbors, brothers, sons, why may it not take the slaves of the slaveholders? Is the blood of the slave dearer to us than the blood of our own sons?

The Senator from Kentucky has objected to the bill, and avows his purpose to vote against it because it proposes to enroll and draft colored persons. I am not surprised at this avowal. Sir, when the act was pending before us a year and a half ago to authorize the Government to employ colored persons for the military service, the Senator opposed it in the strongest terms. He told us there were from eighty to one hundred thousand slaves in Kentucky owned by disloyal masters, and that the people of Kentucky would welcome foreign despotism or they would arm themselves and fight us to the last if we undertook to arm and free these slaves of disloyal men.

Mr. DAVIS. I said no such thing.

Mr. WILSON. I will read what the Senator did say; I quote from the Globe:

"In my own State I have no doubt that there are from eighty to one hundred thousand slaves that belong to disloyal men. You propose to place arms in the hands of the men and boys, or such of them as are able to handle arms, and to manumit the whole mass, men, women, and children, and leave them among us. Do you expect us to give our sanction and our approval to these things? No, no! We would regard their authors as our worst enemies, and there is no foreign despotism that could come to our rescue that we would not joyously embrace before we would submit to any such condition of things as that. But before we had invoked this foreign despotism, we would arm every man and boy that we have in the land, and we would meet you in a death struggle to overthrow together such an oppression and our oppressors. But we expect to effect our deliverance peacefully at the ballot-box; but we know, if it comes to the trial of arms, we will have the support of the great body of the American people."

Mr. DAVIS. That I admit.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly did not mean to overstate it, and I did not mean to misstate his position, or to comment upon it. I simply wish to state that Senator's position on this question of arming colored men. Sir, I want to be understood in the Senate, and I make no reflections by these remarks upon the position of the Senator which he affirms to-day. Kentucky has sent nearly one half of her men fit for duty into the military service of the country, or they have gone into the rebel service. The State has responded with great patriotism to the calls made upon her. She has, I think, done her duty, and done it nobly and bravely. She is called upon now for eighteen thousand men under the call for five hundred thousand, and she has enlisted less than seven hundred. That State, under this call, owes the Government more than seventeen thousand men, and to draft those men will be an immense call on the one hundred and twelve thousand enrolled men. She has a large population of slaves, and according to the Senator's own statement there must be somewhere from ten thousand to fifteen thousand able-bodied slaves of rebel masters in that State. This bill provides that those persons shall be enrolled, that they shall be drafted, that they may enlist in the service and be credited to Kentucky, and that a commission shall be appointed, if they are enlisted, to make an award to loyal masters of the commutation money, or a portion of it, paid by persons who pay commutation rather than render personal service. This bill will be an immense relief to Kentucky. There is not a State in this Union that will be relieved by the passage of this act so much as the State of Kentucky. There is not a State in the Union where a draft for ten thousand, fifteen thousand, or twenty thousand men would press so hard upon the people as in the State of Kentucky. We provide for enrolling all her colored men, slave and free, the slaves of the loyal and disloyal masters, and for drafting them and bringing them into the military service, and for enlisting them. Sir, this will be a boon to the white men of Kentucky, will be an immense relief to them, and will, I doubt not, be hailed and welcomed by her toiling men, upon whom the burdens of military duties press heavily. Slaveholders, caring more for slavery than for the toiling people or for the periled country, may denounce this act, but it will carry relief to the homes of the poor white men of Kentucky. They will soon realize its blessings. They do not believe the blood of the rich man's slaves dearer than their own.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator to say that this commutation money paid from the other States can be applied to the purchase of negroes in the State of Kentucky?

Mr. WILSON. Sir, I refer to the section which reads:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300, to each such colored volunteer, payable out of the commutation money," &c.

The Government is authorized to draft; it accepts substitutes; it accepts a commutation. The Government takes this commutation money and employs it in whatever part of the country it pleases. If it raises men in the State where the commutation money is paid, those men are credited to that State. If it raises the men in other States, they are credited to those other States; but they go to fill up the Army, and the Government gets the men called for. We provide, in order to deal equitably and justly, and with extreme liberality, that there shall be a commission appointed which may award to persons claiming the service or labor of colored men a sum not exceeding $300 for every slave mustered into the military service, to be paid out of the commutation fund. This measure will tend to produce good feeling and harmony among the different portions of the people of the loyal States, and will therefore promote the interests of the whole country. It will put thousands of colored men into the service of the United States, save the blood of thousands of white men, and, to some extent, lighten the burdens of the slaveholding border States which the extinction of slavery may impose upon them. Slavery is destined to perish. It will not, it cannot survive the war into which it has plunged the nation. Slaveholders whose treason, unjust demands, or timidity brought this conflict upon us, have little claim to the generosity of the nation; but, for the harmony of the country, the nation should deal generously with the slave States that have remained faithful to the country.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I stated in as few words as I could use to express my meaning a few objections that would induce me to vote against this report. In performing that task it was not my purpose to enter into any debate or any examination of the merits of the bill; but merely that my own constituency might know the grounds upon which I voted, I rose to state the grounds of my vote in a few general remarks.

The Senator from Massachusetts comes into the Senate Chamber with an extract from a speech of mine made a considerable time back upon a cognate subject, and reads it to the Senate, having first stated it, and according to his usual habit having grossly perverted, misrepresented, and garbled what I had said.

Mr. WILSON. The report will show that it was exactly right.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator had contented himself with reading from my speech as I delivered it, I would have taken no exception whatever to his course; but he first falsely stated the effect of what I said; after he had denounced it on that ground, he then read it. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that Senator is determined to press me to the wall. When I commenced to quote that Senator's personal attacks on me a few days since, made on previous occasions in the Senate, the Senate, I admit in obedience to its rules, sustained a motion calling me to order, and denied me the privilege of quoting and reviewing what he had said in his assaults upon me. I do not complain that the Senate thus enforced its rules, but when the Senate meets out one rule to me and a different one to the Senator from Massachusetts, with all respect and deference to the Senate and its judgment, I think it does me injustice.

Now, I will say one or two words in relation to the bill and report under consideration; and I regret that I am called upon to say anything in addition to the few remarks that I before made. The Senator says this measure is liberal to Kentucky, and it is liberal in the aspect of relieving her white population to some considerable extent from military service and imposing it upon the slaves. Mr. President, I suppose that Kentucky is the best judge of that matter. If she is ready and willing, and offers to raise her full quota of men for this war, it seems to me that it would be not only liberal but it would be nothing more than strict justice to allow her to do it in her own mode. She would greatly prefer to raise all her troops from her white population, and whenever she is in default for an unreasonable time in raising her full quota from her white population, the Government of the United States would then have a pretext and some show of reason for levying the residue in which she was deficient upon her negro population. But she has been in no such default for an unreasonable time. The Senator states truly that the military population of Kentucky according to the rolls is about one hundred and twelve thousand. Her returns to the War Department show that she has supplied upward of fifty thousand white soldiers to the United States Army, nearly one half of her military population, and if there were an accurate and impartial examination of this matter, I doubt whether there is a single State in the Union that has sent a larger proportion of her military population into the service of the United States than that State.

If the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate and the Government wish to deal liberally with Kentucky as he professes, for he says this measure will be more liberal and beneficent to her than to any other State, just let that State have the option to raise her full military quota from her white population, and if she fails to produce her full quota from that population, let Congress then take measures to levy the residue upon the slave population.

But, Mr. President, I merely rose to announce the general position that Kentucky and her representatives in the two Houses of Congress do not need the instruction of the Senator from Massachusetts as to what is the just and most liberal mode to her of raising her quota of the armies of the United States. If she is to be dealt with liberally, or even justly, let the State herself be the judge of the mode and her particular population by and from which she is to make her contributions; and if she does not then respond with every man that is required by the rule which she prefers after a reasonable time, and she is still in default, I will then, at least, remain silent.

The bill proposes to make some compensation to the loyal owners for slaves that are to be put in the Army. I pronounce that the compensation which it offers is a mockery. If you take a stout young negro, that may be a mechanic or a field laborer, and that will hire at from one hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars a year, it is no adequate compensation to his owner if the officers of the United States Government, or the Government itself, or Congress, arbitrarily assess him at the value of $100 or even $300. If the negro is not to be recognized as property, take him, as the Senator from Minnesota suggests, without any compensation or pay to the owner whatever. If you have the right to make a soldier of him, and the citizen who has possession of him has no right or property in him, the Government ought to pay nothing for him. But if he is the property of the owner—upon which no question can be raised with any show of reason—that owner is entitled to his fair and reasonable value. But, sir, do not mock us with a proposition to pay us only what would be a reasonable hire for one or two years as the value of a slave that is from eighteen to twenty-five or thirty years of age; and which slave, before the commencement of our troubles, would have sold for from fifteen hundred to two thousand dollars.

But, sir, I say that you have no power; it is not competent for the Government of the United States to assess the value itself of property that it takes from the citizen. If the negro is put entirely upon the footing of the white man we are entitled to no pay for him. If he cannot be placed in that status he is property, and as to loyal owners is to be paid for at his value. That value is not $300. It is not to be ascertained by the dictum or judgment of the Congress of the United States, or of any of its military officers, but the way sanctioned by usage, universal usage and practice, and that is by fair and impartial valuers appointed by the civil courts. I insist that the loyal owner having property in his slave is entitled to the full and fair estimate of his value by impartial men appointed for that purpose.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I rise to state very briefly one or two reasons why I cannot vote for this report of the committee of conference. In the first place, I believe that this whole conscription business, as provided for by this bill and by the act which it proposes to amend, is a gross violation of the Constitution of the country. The whole tendency of it is to overthrow the constitutional rights of the States and to establish a consolidated despotism. I stated my reasons for this opinion at some length when the first conscription bill was up, and I will not repeat them now.

Sir, the proper way to reach the militia of the States under the Constitution is for Congress to indicate the number of men that it wants, and then to let them be apportioned among the States, and let the States furnish them, even by draft if they find that necessary. That is not done in these conscription bills. They destroy utterly the militia of the States and absorb them into this great consolidated despotism, for it can be wielded for despotic purposes.

This bill makes no limitation as to the number of men that the President may call into the service. It does not limit it to one hundred thousand, to five hundred thousand, or to a million. It leaves the whole matter at the discretion of the President. Sir, I would clothe no man on earth with such power. I do not think that a free people ever should clothe any of their magistrates with such power. It is dangerous to the public liberties, to say the least of it.

There are many features of this bill that to me are objectionable. I do not suppose there is a Senator in this Chamber who was not a member of the committee of conference that understands it, and I doubt whether ever the members of that committee if they were called upon could give a lucid explanation of how the bill stands in many of its features. It is almost interminable in length. The report amends almost every section of the bill; it adopts some sections of the House amendment and excludes others; it adopts some with modifications; it amends some of the sections of the Senate bill; and so on, so that it is almost impossible for us to know how the bill really stands.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the twenty-sixth section is not only just but exceedingly liberal to Kentucky. Allow me to tell that Senator that the twenty-sixth section is not only unjust and illiberal to Kentucky but it is an absolute and direct violation of the Constitution. What is the Constitution of your country upon the subject of taking private property? "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." It will not do for Senators to say that slaves in Kentucky are not private property, for in this very bill you recognize them as private property, and attempt to pay what in the language of the bill is said to be "a just compensation." By the bill you recognize them as private property, and you legislate for payment for them; but I ask you if you do pay a just compensation within the meaning of the Constitution? What is just compensation? It is the full value of the property taken for public use. You take this property for public use and in the very language of the bill you put a limitation on the valuation, and you say that the Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress "charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300, for each such colored volunteer."

Will any Senator here rise in his place and say that that section of the bill is in compliance with the clause of the Constitution which I have read? Is $300 just compensation? Some Senators may think it is. I know that it is not. If you are going to give just compensation, why put in a limitation? You propose that the Secretary of War shall appoint a commission, and that commission shall be the sole judge. You make no provision for an appeal, for a reversal of that decision if the loyal owner should deem it incorrect. You do not say that the owner shall have just compensation within the meaning of the Constitution, but you say "just compensation" in your bill, and you limit it to $300. Why the limitation if the purpose really be to give just compensation?

Mr. President, to strip the bill of its technicalities, it is a bill to rob and to plunder the slaveholders of the loyal States. The purpose of the bill, in my judgment, is not so much to get soldiers into your Army as to strike down this institution in the State of Kentucky and the other adhering States; and I should admire the candor of Senators more if they would rise and speak out with the boldness of truth and manhood, and say that was their intention. Whether a man is right or wrong, I like candid words. To use a common expression, I like fair sailing. Sir, the purpose, so far as my State is concerned, is not so much to get soldiers into your Army. Has Kentucky been in default? No, sir. Does that State desire her quota to be filled up from her slave population? No Senator who has watched the proceedings of that State can say so. Her Legislature has over and over again declared by resolves that the State is opposed to enlisting negroes into the service.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator may have better information on the subject than I have; but, according to my information, Kentucky has by no means filled up her quota, and is in arrears some seventeen thousand men now. If that be incorrect information, I wish the Senator from Kentucky would set me right. Certainly I shall not complain of any compliment he may see fit to pay Kentucky; but if the fact be as I understand, she is actually in default.

Mr. POWELL. That, I suppose, is under the present call. Before the last call her quota was filled.

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

Mr. POWELL. I thought it was. Now, why not allow the State under this last call to fill her quota as she chooses? Her Legislature has declared by resolves over and over again that the State does not wish to fill her quota by that description of her population. That is the opinion of her Governor, and indeed of every Governor we have had since this war commenced, and during that period three of our citizens have filled the executive office.

If the object is not to run athwart of the will of the people of Kentucky, why not pass your law in conformity with their oft-repeated resolves? Why not allow her to put her quota of white men in the field as she proposes to do? By this bill you run counter to her declared will in every form in which it could be given to the public, through her public agents in the State and her public officials. And in doing it, the Senator from Massachusetts says you are exceedingly liberal to Kentucky. Sir, we understand the object of this pretended liberality. It is for the purpose that I have indicated. It is a stab at the institution of slavery in the State. That is the object; there can be none other, for I do not believe that any of the Senators think a slave is a better soldier than a white man. I know they often say he is as good as the white man. I do not believe a word of it. I do not believe a negro can make as good a soldier as a white man. I think there is no question of the fact that the white man is a better soldier, and he will prove himself so upon every field.

But when you speak of "just compensation" in this bill and limit it to $300 when the property may be worth a thousand dollars and more, it is a mockery. I hope this conference report will be voted down. There are many objectionable features in it, but I shall not detain the Senate by going over them, for I know that nothing I can say here will stop this kind of legislation.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not regard this bill as a stab at slavery in the States, and if I did it would not hurt me much; but if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has given me the correct interpretation of it, it does seem to me—I wish I could understand it otherwise—as a very direct, if not a fatal stab, at the white population of the free States. I was compelled, very reluctantly indeed, to vote against the passage of the bill when it was before the Senate. I was opposed to those features of the bill, and I could not reconcile myself to them, nor could I be reconciled to those features of the bill which said substantially, said in effect, "Volunteers cannot be obtained for $400, but any man who will pay $400 to the Government can be exempted from military service." I could not reconcile myself to those features of that bill. Those features have been, as I understand, somewhat modified by the committee of conference; modified in two respects. They do not by the payment of this commutation money exempt the man from service during the whole period for which the draft is made, but for only one year, as I understand. That is an improvement upon the bill; at least it makes it more satisfactory to my own views than the bill as it passed the Senate. But then, on the contrary, they have put the price of commutation down from $400 to $300, and that makes it more obnoxious to me. This other feature of the bill which has just been brought to my attention makes it more obnoxious than anything in the original bill or anything that I could conceive of in any bill, for the bill as it passed the Senate provided that this commutation money should constitute a fund and should be applied to the procuring of substitutes to act within the several districts and to represent the several districts within which and from which the commutation money was paid; so that if I was drafted and chose to pay three hundred or four hundred dollars, that money was directed by that bill to be employed in procuring some volunteer to serve, and thus save the necessity of drafting a man, another of my neighbors.

That was a beneficent feature so far as it went; but the bill as it now comes from the conference committee, as I understand, authorizes the Secretary of War to take this whole commutation fund and to go down into the State of Maryland or the State of Kentucky and purchase negroes to fill up the quotas of those States. What is the consequence? You may draft within the congressional district in which I live, if you please, five thousand men. Two thousand of them pay their commutation. We are then short two thousand men. The money paid by those two thousand men may be transported into the State of Maryland or the State of Delaware or the State of Kentucky or the State of Missouri, and be invested in the purchase of negroes to fill up the quotas of those States. What is the result on my congressional district? Two thousand men are to be drafted there to fill up that quota.

Now, let me ask the Senate what these two thousand men are in the Army for? Not as substitutes for any of their neighbors, but they are in the Army as substitutes for somebody in States they never saw, within which they never placed a foot, within which perhaps they may never place a foot. The chairman of the committee says that a great object is achieved, that you get these colored men into the Army. I admit that is a great object; I have thought so from the beginning; I have never had any squeamishness about that point; but it is no greater object to get colored men into the Army than it is to get white men into the Army; and the authority which enables you to take the one enables you to take the other. And now, in this the third year of the rebellion, for the national Legislature to tell its people that it has got to tax the people of Maine or of Minnesota, and tax them large sums, heavy bonuses, in order to smooth the way to the enlistment of colored men in the Army of the United States, I do not think will strike them gratefully. If I am mistaken about the operation of this, I shall be very glad to have that mistake removed; but I take it just as I understood it to be explained by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I cannot reconcile myself to the propriety of it by any possibility.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that by the existing law the money paid in as commutation is paid out by the Government for soldiers in any part of the country where the Government can get them, and they are credited, not to the States paying the money, but to the place where they happen to live. That has been the practice of the Government under the present law. The Senate bill provided that the money should be used to obtain substitutes in the district where the money was paid. The House of Representatives on consideration struck that out. I may say to the Senator that the Provost Marshal General believes it is a provision which cannot be executed. It was stricken out of the bill, and there was no earthly chance to put it in again.

What the bill now does in this respect is precisely what is done at present. A person is drafted and he pays the commutation money. The Government takes that money and hires a man in Massachusetts, perhaps, or in Maryland, or in Kentucky, but wherever a man is enlisted he is credited to the State from which he is taken.

Mr. HOWE. Exactly; but I understand that Kentucky is called on for eighteen thousand men, and Wisconsin, if you please, for eighteen thousand men also. I do not understand that Wisconsin is at all relieved by the purchase of men in Kentucky? They do not go to get men in excess of the quota of Wisconsin, but to fill up the quota of Kentucky, so that when the money is all expended Kentucky only is full and Wisconsin is minus.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he does not see that by the operation of this act, if it shall be carried into effect as a law, there will never be another conscription, and Wisconsin will never be called upon for another man? If we can go into Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, and there enroll and draft all the colored men as soldiers, and make them fill up the quotas of those States, there will be no necessity for their coming to his State and to mine for new men.

Mr. HOWE. I do not see unless there is a draft how there is going to be any commutation money. Unless you draft soldiers from Iowa and Wisconsin, I do not see how the Government is going to get a fund from commutation with which to get colored men in those other States.

Mr. GRIMES. The money that is to be paid to these drafted men is not to be paid out of this commutation money. The commutation money goes to those who come forward voluntarily and enlist; but the money paid to those who are to be drafted is not required by the bill now under consideration to be paid out of the commutation money at all.

Mr. HOWE. So I understood the chairman. Mr. GRIMES. I am willing to acknowledge to the Senator from Kentucky that I do vote for this measure believing it to be a genuine, good anti-slavery measure. I am not disposed to go beyond the Constitution and the laws for the purpose of striking at slavery, but when I see that there is an opportunity fairly and legitimately for me to strike at slavery, I believe it is not only my right but my duty to do it, and I am going to vote for this measure on that ground among others, because I cannot conceive anything that can be devised in a constitutional and legal form that will strike so severe a blow at the institution as this bill if we shall enact it into a law.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Does he think it would be a violation of the Constitution to take the slave of a loyal man and pay him $300, provided that slave was worth five hundred or a thousand dollars?

Mr. GRIMES. I believe the Constitution says we shall pay a just compensation to the owner of private property taken for public use. Admitting that this is property, is there any necessity for anybody to determine it but ourselves? Who is to determine what is the value of the property? We say it is three hundred or one hundred dollars. I conceive that that is no violation of the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires us to go before a court and jury to determine what may be the value of this kind of property, admitting it to be property.

Mr. HOWE. I want to have this point settled between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand from one of them, the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is the commutation money which is to constitute the fund to be employed under the bill in this way. I understand from the Senator from Iowa that it is some other fund, I do not know what fund. I should like to have that point settled.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator will permit me, I will read the section now under consideration. The first clause of that section as it was passed by the House of Representatives provided:

"That all able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person owes service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States, on freeing the person."

It allowed the disloyal master to retain his property in his slave, and if the slave was drafted, allowed him to go into the Army and serve in the capacity of a soldier during the war, and then to be dragged back into slavery at the end of the war. The committee of conference have amended this provision by striking out "persons of African descent" in the second line, and inserting "colored persons;" and by inserting after the word "thereof," in the eighth line, the words "and thereupon" (that is upon his being mustered into the service) "such slave shall be forever free;" and by striking out in the twelfth and thirteenth lines the words, "on freeing the person;" so that it shall be no longer optional with the master whether he shall be free or not, provided he has once enlisted.

The clause I have just read provides that the master shall be paid the $100 bounty now provided by law; and paid it from what? From the commutation fund? It does not say so.

Mr. HOWE. Go on.

Mr. GRIMES. I was talking to the Senator about the question of draft. Now, the section goes on and provides:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer"

not a drafted man; that is referred to in the preceding clause; but "to whom a," not the colored drafted man, but "to whom a colored volunteer may owe service, a just compensation, not exceeding $300, for each such colored volunteer," not drafted man, "payable out of the fund derived from commutations; and every such colored volunteer upon being mustered into the service of the United States shall be free."

Mr. HOWE. Precisely.

Mr. GRIMES. I was calling the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that he was arguing the question as though the money that is to be paid to the drafted men is to come out of the commutation fund; but the bill does not provide that it shall come out of the commutation fund. There are two different classes of persons provided for in this section; one of them the colored men who are drafted under the law, and the other volunteers who have enlisted or may enlist. The contemporaneous history of it in the proceedings in the House of Representatives shows that the first part of the section was inserted in that House upon the motion of a distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania, and the last part of it, relating to volunteers, upon the motion of a Representative from Maryland. Now, what we want to reach in this bill is an opportunity to draft the colored men in the several States. I would not be particular about this last clause of the section if it were not already there.

Mr. HOWE. You get that opportunity to draft colored men in every State where they exist by simply enrolling them. Then you can draft them. But a volunteer is not a drafted man. You propose to use the commutation money raised in one State to secure colored volunteers in other States, to avoid drafts within those other States, drafts either of colored or white men. That is the inevitable interpretation. The Senator from Massachusetts was entirely correct in his statement of it.

Mr. WILSON. You do that now under the existing law.

Mr. HOWE. I understand from the chairman, and I have no doubt he is entirely correct in saying so, that that is the practical application of the fund; but the effort of this Congress has been to amend that law. God knows it needed amendment enough; but do not tell me that this is an amendment, for it is anything but an amendment. It is not an improvement; it is a change, but I do say with all the deference in the world that it is a change for the worse, and not for the better. I cannot see the justice or the propriety of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish some gentleman would explain to me where is the necessity and what is the use of incorporating into this bill any provision for the purpose of drafting, not colored folks, but negroes. Cannot this Administration get enough of that class of people without attempting to draft them? If there is a slave that is unwilling to leave his master and to go into the public service to fight what he is told is the battle for his freedom, are you going to drag him from his home contrary to his own wish?

Let me say to Senators that perhaps I have had more observation in reference to the power of this Administration to get negro soldiers than most of them. I live in a community where I have seen the operations of this Administration in that regard. I hold in my hand a letter which I received only a few moments ago, stating that they have negro soldiers from Pennsylvania marching through the section of country where I live, inducing away, persuading away the slaves of any and everybody, and that in the little village in which I live these negro soldiers are now quartered, marching up and down the streets with horrid oaths, and snapping their pistols at white men; and the friend that writes to me congratulates me that I am in Washington, and hopes that I will remain here in peace, because that peaceful village has become unfit to live in by this effort to invade the households of peaceable, quiet citizens, and seduce from their employ their domestic servants.

Surely, sir, with the efforts this Administration is now making in the border slaveholding States, sending there negro soldiers with their white officers, going to men's houses, seducing their slaves from them in their own presence, it can get enough of this class of soldiers without forcing the faithful negro slave into the ranks against his will. The little experience that we have had in the lower county of the State of Delaware where the few slaves we have are, and on the Eastern Shore of Maryland with which I am somewhat familiar, satisfies me that it is not worth while to incorporate in your bill any provision for the compulsory service of this class of beings. You have depicted to them a beautiful political Eden, in which they are to live and enjoy all the blessings of freedom. You have thrown open to them the galleries of this Senate, and to-day they sit among the white gentlemen who here congregate, and almost every day recently we have seen them in the gallery set apart by the Senate for ladies. Do you suppose that they are so blind, so insensible to all the advantages which your wise legislation proposes in their behalf, that they will not appreciate these high favors? When you say that all men and all women are equal before the law, and not only equal before the law but equal socially by throwing open the galleries of the Senate of the United States for their admission, do you suppose that they are so obtuse that they will not join in your cry for universal freedom and universal equality before the law?

Sir, the Eastern Shore of Maryland has become almost depopulated of this class of people on account of the golden visions which you have painted to their eyes, and the hopes which you have excited in their breasts, hopes never to be realized, but still hopes which they fondly believe will be realized.

Sir, I propose not to give counsel to any one, but if I were to give any counsel in favor of the incorporation of this class of human beings into the military organizations of the country, I would not for one moment propose any compulsory mode of service upon their part. I would only take up the beautiful and eloquent diatribes upon the subject of human freedom and human liberty and the equality of all men before the law; and if I was heart and soul in favor of this means of replenishing your armies, I would consent to employ white officers to march slave soldiers through a State, ay, and let those white officers read to them these golden visions of the future which you have painted to their imaginations, and rest assured you would find no occasion for compelling the services of any negro except those who from choice prefer to remain around the original hearthstone near which they were born.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say one word to the Senator from Delaware now upon this "golden vision." It has not any particular reference to the pending question, I admit, but I want to say one word because it will explain a recent vote that I gave here in the Senate, and I took no pains to explain it then.

I am a stickler for the right of the States to select their own representatives here. It is a fundamental doctrine with me; and therefore when a resolution was pending before the Senate a short time since, requiring the members of this body before they should take a seat here to subscribe an oath different from and in addition to the oath prescribed by the Constitution, I felt compelled to vote against that resolution, because I thought it imposed a new restriction upon the right of the States to select their own representatives. I voted against that resolution although I knew that my vote might have a tendency to preserve in his seat the late colleague of the Senator from Delaware; and now can that Senator or any one suppose that when I stood up here and by my vote defended the right of the State of Delaware to send here such a representative as his late colleague was, can it be supposed by any one that I would object to the right of Delaware, if she saw fit, to send here for a representative a man a little darker than his late colleague, but a good deal more loyal? Certainly not. No one could suppose me guilty of such an inconsistency as that. It is because I insist on the right of Delaware to send here a colored citizen if she prefers it. Were I myself a citizen of Delaware, I should not vote for a black man if I could find a white man who was better; but I should vote for a black loyal man rather than a white disloyal man, a great many times; so that whenever the people of Delaware or Wisconsin find that their best representative is blacker than myself or blacker than the Senator from Delaware, I shall insist upon their constitutional right to send him here to represent them, and I hope never to find a Senator here who will gainsay or deny that right.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not understand the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin to have any application to me; but to indulge his wit perhaps, (for I do not think it can be charged to a desire to indulge the malevolence of his heart, because from my association with him I cannot think he possesses that characteristic,) he has made a remark here in reference to my late colleague which I think upon reflection he will see is not only unjust in itself but improper to be made. He referred to the fact that he had no objection to the State of Delaware sending a representative here of a little darker complexion but more loyal than my late colleague.

Now, sir, I shall enter into no defense of that colleague. He was a member of the Senate of the United States for thirteen years, personally known to every member of this body. When the test oath to which the Senator alludes was proposed to be administered to Senators, he deemed that that oath was unconstitutional and asked a judicial determination of the Senate whether he and other Senators should take it. That decision was made, against an unanswerable argument, in my judgment, made by my former colleague, and he came forward and took that oath, having previously told you that there was nothing in it that he could not conscientiously take, and then he retired from this body, surrendering his trust to his State. When he was in his seat, I do not recollect that the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator upon this floor charged him here in his presence with disloyalty.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will do me the justice to recollect that I have not charged his late colleague with disloyalty to-day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator whether he did not say that he had no objection to the State of Delaware sending a representative here a little darker but more loyal than my late colleague.

Mr. HOWE. Substantially.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then, sir, what is the implication? That my late colleague was not a loyal man. Well, sir, if the term "loyalty" is to be used in the sense which I saw it was before a committee of investigation, the Committee on the Judiciary, as reported in the papers, "loyalty to the negro"—if that be a test of loyalty, real loyalty to the Government and the Constitution of this country, I have no doubt that my late colleague would rejoice in the appellation of being a disloyal man; and who would not? I would. But if loyalty means fidelity to the constitutional Government established by our fathers, to the Constitution of this country as adopted by men in whose presence—I say it without either meaning or designing personal offense to anybody—the statesmen of the present day are pigmies in the presence of giants; if loyalty means devotion to that Constitution and that constitutional form of government, then when my colleague was here the Senator from Wisconsin and no other Senator charged him with disloyalty in that sense of the term.

Sir, I do not intend to extend these remarks. I have only made them such as I have because my former colleague is not here to defend himself; but I doubt not that on all occasions when he shall be present in any body and he is charged directly or by implication with a want of fidelity as a citizen to the Constitution and Government of his country, he will give such an answer as becomes a gentleman, and such an answer as a brave man knows how to make.

Mr. HOWARD. I find, sir, some difficulty in voting for this amendment suggested by the committee of conference, and in order to show what the bill will be if it shall be enacted in the language of the report of that committee I will read the twenty-sixth section, so that we may know exactly what we are voting for or against. I have taken some little pains to alter the text of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives so as to make it correspond with the report of the committee, and if I am correct in these alterations the twenty-sixth section, which is the one now under consideration, will read as follows:

"SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States."

So far for the drafted; now as to the colored volunteer:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the commutation money, and any such colored volunteer on being mustered into the service shall be free. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted or have volunteered in the military service of the United States all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as to those who may be hereafter recruited."

To which section, as thus read, the committee of conference proposes to add the following, directly after the last passage I have read:

"But the men of color, drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States or subdivisions of States wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as United States colored troops."

Such will be the entire section twenty-six if it shall be enacted according to the recommendation of the committee of conference.

My first difficulty is in paying the master of a slave who has been drafted into the service of the United States the bounty of $100. What will be the effect? The slave is taken from his master by the draft and coerced into the service of the United States, for which he is to receive his pay and clothing and freedom. He is to receive no bounty; nothing but his pay and clothing. Being a slave when he was enrolled and drafted, he was possessed of no property on the face of the earth; he was totally destitute of property of any kind, whether lands or goods. On being discharged from the service at the end of his term, he goes out upon the world with nothing whatever in his pocket except the remainder of the pay which he may have received. It is true he is a freeman, but he has no money; he is turned out totally helpless upon the world to shift for himself, without any aid whatever from the Government in the shape of bounty or further compensation. We have heard a great deal said about treating the white and colored troops in the same manner, and placing them upon the same footing as to compensation. This makes a distinction greatly to the prejudice of the colored soldier.

But, sir, the section goes on and declares that where colored soldiers have volunteered into the service of the United States, the master, if the negro soldier was a slave, shall receive a sum, to be awarded by a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of War, not to exceed $300; and the fund from which this payment is to be made is made up of the commutation money which is paid by persons who contribute their money instead of their services. This clause is equally objectionable upon the ground of injustice with the former one; because, instead of giving anything to the colored soldier, it gives everything to his master. The colored soldier, therefore, under this clause is by no means on an equal footing with the white soldier.

Then again as it strikes me—I speak with great respect and great deference to the committee who have reported this amendment—it is doing great injustice to the loyal States whose people make up this commutation fund. What will be the effect? A very large fund, amounting to millions upon millions of dollars, will undoubtedly be accumulated in the form of commutation money, and the effect will be to allow the Secretary of War to lay his hand upon this fund and pay it out in order to procure colored volunteers in the slaveholding loyal States without giving any credit whatever for it to the States whose people contribute the money. Take my own State, for instance. Suppose a certain number of troops are required to be contributed by Michigan, and a large portion of the persons included in the enrollment see fit not to render their personal service but to pay $300 each. This money is to be taken by the Secretary of War and employed in purchasing up colored troops in Kentucky or in any other portion of the United States to any amount, taking the money of my constituents and procuring black troops with it, without crediting my constituents with a single man for the money they thus contribute, no matter how large the sum may be.

It seems to me this is another case of injustice and hardship. I think it will not be very acceptable to the mass of the people of the loyal States. They will not be entirely willing, I fear, to contribute their cold cash in order to exempt themselves from a draft, and have that cash employed in slaveholding States in the purchase, so to speak, of black troops, while they themselves get no credit for it at home. They may endure it, sir. The times are of such a character as to make us submit to almost anything the Government may ask; but I submit to Senators that this is a case of hardship which ought, if possible, to be avoided.

Much is said, Mr. President, about the slave being private property, and being private property under the Constitution. I cannot regard a slave as private property in the sense of the Constitution. I hold that that instrument contains no guarantee whatever of slave property; and as held by the courts it recognizes slavery only in that clause which authorizes the rendition of fugitives from one State to another; and when gentlemen tell me that a slave is by virtue of the Constitution not a person but private property, I take issue with them. I hold that every person called a slave in the slave States is just as much liable to render military service for the defense of the United States as a white person, and that he is to be treated in the same way we treat white persons who are employed in that service.

The Constitution declares, it is true, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. What did the Convention mean when they used that language? Did they mean to affirm the modern doctrine that there was or could be property in man? Or did they mean by the word "property" in that connection only those things which are the subjects of property by the common law of England? Do we not always in construing the Constitution of the United States have reference to the common law as it existed at the time of the formation of the Constitution, and will any gentleman tell me that by the common law of England at that time the courts of England recognized property in man? We all know quite well they did not, but they rejected that assumption at that time, and have done so ever since. So that I cannot agree with Senators who contend that under this clause the Government of the United States when it sees fit to lay its hand on negroes for the purpose of defending the country in time of war is violating the right of property by refusing to pay slaveholders for the slaves thus employed.

Sir, there is no doubt about the power of Congress to seize upon the minor son of a citizen of the United States and compel him to render military service, or to seize upon the apprentice of any master and compel him to render the same service; but is the son the property of the father? is the apprentice the property of the master? No, sir, no one will pretend this. They are persons. But are they not just as much property in the sense of the Constitution as negro slaves are property?

When you take the only son of a widow, as you may do, when you take the sole prop of aged and infirm parents and force them into the military service, you do not reward the parents, you do not give the money to the parents, you do not give the bounty to the parents. You give those rewards to the soldier whom you take and force into the military service, and do it because he is a person, not property. And still, sir, there is no more right of property appertaining to the slaveholder than to the father or to the master.

What is this property which is claimed to belong to the slaveholder? Is it property in the flesh and bones of the slave? No, sir. We all know that the negro slave, although a slave, is held to be morally responsible and amenable in the courts of justice for the commission of crime. Is a mere chattel amenable for crime? No, sir! We know that the son is amenable for crime; we know that the apprentice is amenable for crime. The owner of a slave is restrained by the law of the community where he lives in various ways from committing outrages upon his slave; and there is nothing in the case by which he can lay a claim for property, except the mere service of the slave. You do not own his bones, you do not own his hands, or his head, or his heart, or his soul; you cannot dispose of him as you may of any ordinary article of property. In regard to property as understood at common law, the owner has the absolute right to destroy it at will, provided he commits no injury to his neighbor in so doing. Can you do so with the slave? No.

The only thing, I repeat, to which the master can lay any claim whatever, is the service of the slave. The father enforces the same claim to the service of a son, the master to the service of his apprentice; but, sir, we do not pay the father, we do not pay the master; but we pay the money to the son or to the apprentice when we call the one or the other into the military service. Why not do the same in regard to the slave? Where is the distinction in principle?

Gentlemen say, "If you take our slaves, you ought to pay us for them." The father may make the same reply, and so may the master of an apprentice; but we never do so; we never pay either.

Now, sir, when the necessities of the country are such as to call on any portion of its population for military service for its defense, I see no reason whatever for exempting the slave. I see no ground whatever why the owner of the slave should be entitled to any privilege or any immunity which does not belong at least to the father or to the master of the apprentice. I think, sir, the distinction is entirely without any foundation, and that the Government have a right, whenever they shall say the word, to take the slave, to force him into the military service and compel him to defend the country. But, sir, in doing this I submit we should be doing a very contemptible thing not to give this same slave his freedom. I maintain that the moment you muster a slave into the service of the United States, you do upon principles of law, ipso facto, forever emancipate him from the control of his master. I assert it as an abstract principle of law, that the freedom of the slave is an immediate and irresistible result of such an employment of the slave. I would therefore not pay the slaveholder one dollar, either for the emancipation of his slave or for bounty. For these reasons I shall be compelled to vote against this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, because of the necessity under which we supposed the Government was to raise more troops in order to keep a force sufficient to put down this rebellion, it has been deemed necessary by both Houses of Congress to pass a bill something of the description of the one which I hold in my hand, and which is now before the Senate. The debate which has arisen has grown out of the twenty-sixth section of the bill as reported by the committee of conference. That section, if I recollect aright, was inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives, and the object of the section is twofold: it provides first, that in case a colored soldier be drafted, $100 shall at once be paid as a bounty to his master; and second, where they have volunteered, that a commission shall be appointed to ascertain how much shall be paid, provided the amount is not to exceed $300, and that amount, so ascertained to be due by the commission to be constituted under this section, is to be paid the owner provided he be a loyal man.

The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Delaware have assumed what I think cannot be maintained, that there is no authority to bring into the military service of the United States slaves. I do not propose to argue that question now, because I have already stated to the Senate on a former occasion what was my opinion in relation to it. But I suppose that the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Kentucky particularly place their opposition to that power on the ground that there is no authority to conscript soldiers, for, if there is an authority to conscript, it seems to me inevitably to follow that it can be exercised over all persons in the United States without reference to color or condition who are bound by an allegiance to the United States.

Whether any of these colored persons are in that condition which entitles the master to be paid if he be brought into the service of the United States is another question. The honorable member from Michigan is of opinion that inasmuch as a slave owes allegiance to the United States, and may be called upon to be a soldier of the United States, he is to be considered as standing in the same condition with every white man; and especially in the condition of a minor son of a living father or mother, or of an apprentice; and he says, moreover, that the provision in the Constitution which prohibits the appropriation of private property for public use without compensation—

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator pardon me for interrupting him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I certainly did not say that a son or an apprentice stood in the same relation to the father or the master that a slave stands to his master. That is an inference of the Senator, not what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not understand the Senator to say that the son of a white man or woman was a slave; but I meant to say that I understood the honorable member as contending that because of the relationship of son to father or mother, and the relationship of apprentice to master, there is no more reason why you should compensate the owner of a slave if you take him into the service of the United States than there is to compensate, in the one case, the father or the mother, and, in the other case, the master; and the honorable member from Michigan, with that astuteness which very often belongs to our profession, thinks he finds in the fact that the Constitution of the United States nowhere declares—and there is no law outside of the Constitution which declares that the master owned the bone, the heart, or any of the features of his slave—that he has no property in his slave, and he cannot dispose of his bone, nor dispose of his heart, nor dispose of anything else physically belonging to him; and because he cannot, according to the view of my honorable friend from Michigan, he supposes that the master has no property in the slave. Why, sir, he does dispose of the heart and the bone of the slave. The honorable member admits that the Constitution of the United States secures the master in the service of his slave, and we all know that at the time the Constitution was adopted the system of slavery existed in nearly all the States in the Union, and that, under that system of slavery, the right to the service of the slave gave to the master the right to dispose of the slave; and I imagine if he disposed of the slave he disposed of his bones and his heart for the time being. You cannot separate the right to the service from the man himself. If you give an absolute right in one man as against another to the services of that other, and give it to such an extent that he may dispose of it by will and make it responsible for his debts, you give him an interest in everything in the man without declaring by law that he has or shall have a specific interest in his heart and bones.

Then the honorable member tells us that the Constitution of the United States, in that clause which exempts private property from public use except on compensation, is to be construed with reference to the common law, and he assumes as true that by the common law, as it existed in 1789, there could be no property in slaves. That is not so, with due deference to the honorable member. Slavery existed in the common law long after 1789. If the honorable member will look to a decision pronounced at a much more recent period than that, by Lord Stowell, he will find that, overruling the decision of Lord Mansfield in the Somerset case, he held, that as slavery was recognized in the West Indies at that time, a slave who came to England, where it was not recognized, was still a slave, and the master had a right to take him away as against the law of England; repudiating the doctrine of Lord Mansfield, that the air of England was so pure that slavery could not exist within its influence. And if my honorable friend will look at his Blackstone (and considering his familiarity with it I am a little surprised that it should have escaped him) he will find that the right to this description of property is considered as a right to property; and the only question in such a case is, what is the extent of the right? Whatever it is, as between master and slave, the master is, to the extent that he is entitled to the service, the owner; and you cannot, as it seems to me, distinguish, if there be ownership, between this kind of property and any other kind of property.

But, Mr. President, if it was not so I should like to know upon what ground, logical or otherwise, historical or otherwise, the honorable member from Michigan is justified in saying that that clause in the Constitution is to be considered with reference to what was property under the laws of England in 1789. Sir, the Constitution was adopted for the United States. Every one of the provisions put in there with reference to property or to anything else intended to be guarantees, was put in for the purpose of protecting the citizens of the United States, as they then were under their system of laws as that system then existed. My honorable friend from Michigan will not deny, I am sure, that in the slave States in 1789, and indeed in most of the States that are now free, slave property was just as well known as property as any chattel. When, therefore, the Convention put into that clause a provision that no private property should be taken for public use without compensation, upon what ground of reasoning is it that the honorable member claims the right of excepting from that clause any particular species of property?

The only ground alleged is that this particular species of property was property not known to the common law. But we were not making a constitution for England or for any part of the world except for ourselves. What we intended was to protect ourselves by those several guarantees; and whatever, therefore, was the condition of the United States in 1789, with reference to slave property was intended to be protected by that clause as well as any other description of property. Now, in the slave States—I believe some of the States have modified it under the influence which was certain, independent of positive legislation or war, sooner or later to obliterate this stain upon the escutcheon of a free Republic, slavery—their laws have been modified; and under nearly all the laws of all the States this species of property—

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator answer me one question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. It is this: whether it would be competent for the Congress of the United States, under that particular clause of the Constitution, to take and set free the entire slave population of the United States on making compensation to the slaveholders? Has Congress that power under the Constitution? What are his views on that question?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question I am not prepared to answer. What I mean to say is this: if they cannot do it, it is not because of the objection that this property is not under the provision of that clause. If they cannot do it, it is because such legislation as that would not be an appropriation of this kind of property to public use; that is all. If the court shall decide that the Legislature itself has the authority to decide what is necessary to be taken for public use, and Congress in its legislative capacity shall decide that all the slaves in the United States shall be set free, because it is useful to the United States that they should be set free, then they would decide that the law was operative, but they would require the United States to pay just as much—

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly; but then who is to judge of the necessity for taking property, whether slave property or other property?

Mr. JOHNSON. The sovereign, always.

Mr. HOWARD. Is not the judgment of Congress on that point conclusive? Has a court a right to inquire into the degree of necessity? Is not the decision of Congress final on the subject? Suppose Congress should decide it to be necessary to take all the slave property of the United States on making compensation, would they not, according to the construction of the Senator from Maryland of this particular clause, have the right to emancipate every slave in the United States under this particular clause? It strikes me they would.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unquestionably with this limitation. Whatever is public use and public necessity with reference to the appropriation of private property must be for the exclusive determination of Congress. There is no doubt about that; and the only question before the court, should the case arise, would be whether this was public use. It does not follow, because Congress in cases of public danger have the authority to decide for themselves the necessity of appropriating property for that purpose, that it binds everybody. It does not follow because they have that power, that Congress is vested with the power to take property for a use not public. For example, Congress could not say that the slaves in Maryland should be taken and given to the owners of slaves or of anybody else out of Maryland, or to take them from the present owners and give them to other citizens in Maryland; for that would be obviously not an appropriation of private property for public use, but a mere change of ownership.

Mr. HOWARD. The language of the Constitution is, "taken for public use," not appropriated for public use.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, "taken for public use." What I intended to say just now was, that I was not prepared to answer whether Congress under its general power has not the authority to manumit all negroes for the public use; which would be the result of emancipation. But upon that question I do not wish to be considered as standing committed.

But there is a great difference between slave property and the property the father has in his child and the master in his apprentice. The father cannot sell his child; he cannot devise his child; nor can a guardian dispose of his ward; nor is the ward nor the child responsible for the debts of the guardian or the debts of the parent; nor can the apprentice be disposed of by the master. It is a personal service for a temporary period which gives only to the particular master the authority to hold the apprentice, and binds the apprentice only to discharge his duty to the particular master; that is all.

My honorable friend from Kentucky and my friend from Delaware objected to this clause on a different ground. They say, and I do not propose now to discuss that question, there is no authority to take these slaves. That has been decided. They have been taken, and they will continue to be taken. You have now some forty or fifty thousand or more of these troops in the actual service of the United States; and the question for us is, even if I agreed that there was any authority to take them, what is the best thing we can do for the owner? They are taken now without compensation; the master gets nothing; and if you do not pass a bill similar to this section, they will continue to be taken and the master will get nothing.

What does this section do? In the first place it proposes, instead of leaving the matter as it now is—and that, in my view, is a very great improvement and a very great amelioration of the condition of the masters in the slave States—that all the slaves capable of bearing arms shall be enrolled. The difficulty that we have had in Maryland, the wrong, as I think, that has been perpetrated upon the people of Maryland—Kentucky has so far escaped; Delaware has not escaped; she has suffered the same wrong—is, that these recruiting officers go into our households and take away the men and the women just as they please. They take all from one man and none from another. They have the power of selection. They may ruin anybody if they think proper to do it, so far as he can be ruined by taking from him all the labor by which he is able and can alone for the time carry on his farming operations, and they leave another untouched.

My opinion from the start has been, and I ventured to tell the President, that if he wished to have these black troops the proper mode was to have them enrolled and let them be drafted as others were, leaving them, with the consent of their masters, to volunteer; and that is what he did in the last particular in Missouri. When I went to him with our Governor and complained of what was actually being done in reference to our negroes on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, I told him his order to General Schofield and General Schofield's order in pursuance of it, did not authorize the taking of any negroes into the military service of the United States without the consent of the owner, and I understood him at the time to say that that was precisely what he intended, and what he should carry out. But other counsels prevailed, and his officers were permitted to go through Maryland and go through Delaware, and go through Missouri afterwards, and take whom they pleased.

Now what I want is, that that should be corrected, to the extent at least of having all enrolled and let each master stand on the same footing. If his servant is drafted, this bill, provided he is a loyal master, gives him $100. He does not get that now. He does not get a dollar. If his servant volunteers, and he is a loyal master, he receives $300. That is so much gained. We have lost out of Maryland, I think, some ten or twelve thousand men who have been taken into the military service, and their wives and their children have gone with them. This bill does not propose to pay for the wives and children, but it proposes to pay $300 for each one of our men, provided the commission for which the section provides shall find that they are worth three hundred dollars or more, limiting the amount, if they should be found to be worth more, to $300. I do not see upon what ground, as matters now stand, my friend from Kentucky can object to a provision of this description. It gives our people something when, unless you pass it, they will get nothing.

But, Mr. President, it does more than that. It in a great measure satisfies the people whose interests are affected. They are now burning under what they believe to be wrong. Their property is taken without any compensation at all. The majority of the slaveholders in Maryland, I think I can say with truth, have been perfectly willing from the first, or at any rate within the last year, that all the able-bodied slaves in Maryland should be taken provided the master received anything like a reasonable compensation. Now, what have you done? When the honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable member from Wisconsin and the member from Minnesota say they are unwilling to pay anything for this species of property, they forget what they have done; and in saying that they forget what they have done, I mean what Congress has done. You passed a resolution—and I do not know but those Senators voted for it—promising what was called compensated emancipation. You told Maryland, therefore, and you told us all, "Let your slaves be free and you shall receive compensation." It passed by an almost unanimous vote. It did not appropriate the money, but said in substance the United States would pay. When you emancipated the slaves of this District, you authorized a commission to be constituted, and voted a sum not to exceed an average of $300 for each slave. You passed a bill for Missouri which appropriated some twenty million dollars for the same purpose.

I submit, therefore, to the honorable member from Minnesota and to the honorable Senator from Michigan that it is too late now to say that that principle was not one sanctioned by the Constitution. Good faith is as dear to a Government as to an individual. A matured policy held out to the citizen as an inducement to regulate his conduct, if not adhered to, is just as much a violation of public faith as the same conduct on the part of an individual would be a violation of private faith.

What are you to do with this money unless you appropriate it in that way? The honorable member from Michigan says that the $300 which the men of Michigan who are drafted may have to pay into the Treasury, they will not consent shall be appropriated to this purpose. They can avoid that by not paying it and going into the Army themselves. That is a difficulty easily obviated. If their patriotism is so exuberant that they are unwilling that the owner of this slave property who is ruined for the time by having his property taken for the public use shall be paid out of any money coming from themselves, let them show their patriotism and show the indignation in which they hold the feeling by going into the Army and covering their State with still more glory than she has already achieved. What is to be done with the money? You are to use it for bounties, are you not? What difference does it make to you whether you give the bounty to the owner of a black man or to a white man who goes into the service? The result is the same provided it be true, (and it is not for the Senator to say that it is not true,) that the black man is as good a soldier as the white man.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 48.

But, sir, to conclude, throwing aside all these matters about which these differences of opinion exist, and looking to the actual condition of the country, I appeal to the patriotism of the Senate, and particularly to the patriotism of that portion of the Senate that constitute a majority of this body, and are in favor of the policy of the present Administration, and anxious to bring this war to a determination, to give up all their mere private differences, sacrifice them upon the altar of the public good, and show that with one heart and one mind, shoulder to shoulder, you will meet all the exigencies that the Constitution authorizes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, when the Senator from Kentucky was addressing the Senate a few days since on another bill he let fall some remarks which I thought required an answer, and I thought I would make them immediately on that bill; but that bill was crowded out of the way yesterday by the special assignment of the Senate assigning yesterday to the consideration of matters belonging to the District of Columbia, and to-day this report of the committee of conference comes up. I have sat here some two or three hours while this subject has been under discussion thinking I would postpone until that other bill came up the remarks which I thought it my duty to make, deeming them not to be entirely relevant to this bill; but after the experience of to-day I beg pardon of the Senate for ever having thought that anything that anybody thought fit to say upon any subject at any time upon any bill was not in order; and as the same sentiment, to which I propose to respond, uttered by the Senator from Kentucky, has been reiterated again and again in the discussion upon this measure, I propose to submit a few words at the present time upon it; and that is, upon the question whether man can hold property in man.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky in speaking of those who hold the doctrine that man cannot hold property in man, said that nobody but a madman at the present time could entertain such a sentiment. I see that he or somebody else has revised the speech and put madman into Latin, and it reads now that nobody who is not non compos mentis would entertain such a sentiment. I think it had more force as it was originally uttered, and that the attempt of the Senator from Kentucky to make his speech a little more classical, while it does credit to his learning does not much to his taste. I prefer to answer it as it was originally uttered, that none but a madman can entertain such a sentiment.

Mr. President, I believe in that sentiment. I believe it as firmly as I believe the truth of my own existence. I believe that when God made man He made something different from anything else He ever had made, and while He gave to man dominion over all other creatures He had created He reserved the immortal soul for His own peculiar worship, and He never intended that merchandise should be made of it. I know that slavery asserts a different doctrine and a different dogma, and it is to that to which I wish to address myself.

Slavery claims to own a man—his bones, his muscles, his heart, his everything. Slavery with impious and defiant aspect stands at the foot of the cross of Christ and challenges the truth of His dying declaration when He bowed His head upon the cross and said "It is finished;" the price of man's redemption is paid. Slavery says no, the price of all souls is not yet paid; we own souls over which we have final control. As somebody else has said what I should like to have been able to say upon this subject so much better than I can say it, I prefer to give that to the Senate. I will read an extract from a speech of Lord Brougham, an eminent "madman" on the other side of the water, made before the British Parliament on the 12th of July, 1830. Lord Brougham said:

"Tell me not of rights. Talk not of the property of the planter in his slaves. I deny the right. I acknowledge not the property. The principles, the feelings of our common nature rise in rebellion against it. Be the appeal made to the understanding or to the heart, the sentence is the same that rejects it. In vain you tell me of laws that sanction such a claim. There is a law above the enactment of human codes, the same throughout the world, the same in all times, such as it was before the daring genius of Columbus pierced the night of ages and opened to one world sources of power, wealth, and knowledge; to another all unutterable woes. Such it is at this day. It is the law written by the finger of God on the heart of man; and by that law, eternal, unchangeable, while men despise fraud and loathe rapine, and abhor blood, they shall reject with indignation the wild and guilty fancy that man can hold property in man. In vain you appeal to treaties, to covenants between nations. The covenants of the Almighty, whether the old covenant or the new, denounce such unholy pretensions. To those laws did they of old refer who maintained the African trade. Such treaties did they cite, and not truly, for by one shameful compact you bartered the glories of Blenheim for the traffic in blood. Yet, in despite of law and of treaty, that infernal traffic is now destroyed and its votaries put to death like other pirates.

"How came this change to pass? Not assuredly by Parliament leading the way; but the country at length awoke; the indignation of the people was kindled; it descended in thunder and smote the traffic, and scattered its guilty profits to the winds.

"Now, then, let the planters beware! Let their assemblies beware! Let the Government at home beware! Let the Parliament beware! The same country is once more awake, awake to the condition of negro slavery; the same indignation kindles in the bosom of the same people; the same cloud is gathering that annihilated the slave trade; and if it shall descend again, they on whom its crash may fall will not be destroyed before I have warned them; but I pray that their destruction may turn away from us the more terrible judgments of God."

Again, sir, Fowell Buxton, in a speech made on the same bill in the British Parliament, said:

"Is there no difference between a vested interest in a house or a tenement and a vested interest in a human being? no difference between a right to brick and mortar and a right to the flesh of a man? a right to torture his body and to degrade his mind at your good will and pleasure? There is this difference: the right to the house originates in law, and is reconcilable to justice; the claim—for I will not call it a right—to the man originated in robbery, and is an outrage upon every principle of justice and every tenet of religion."

Now, I will give to the Senator the declarations of a "madman" from Kentucky. Dr. Rice, in his speech before the convention which framed the constitution of that State, said:

"The owners of slaves are licensed robbers, and not the just proprietors of what they claim: freeing them is not depriving them of property, but restoring it to the right owner. It is suffering the unlawful captive to escape. It is not wronging the master, but doing justice to the slave, restoring him to himself. Emancipation would only take away property that is its own property, and not ours; property that has the same right to possess us as we have to possess it; property that has the same right to convert our children into dogs and calves and colts, as we have to convert theirs into beasts; property that may transfer our children to strangers by the same right that we transfer theirs."

Mr. JOHNSON. When was that speech made? Before the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indies?

Mr. DAVIS. That speech of Dr. Rice was made in 1849.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean the speech of Lord Brougham.

Mr. HALE. In 1830.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator tell me whether Lord Brougham did not vote between twenty and thirty million pounds sterling to pay the slaveholders of the West Indies?

Mr. HALE. I have not the record of his votes before me.

Mr. President, it is certainly true that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in the discourse which he made on this subject, gave authorities from the Supreme Court of the United States sanctioning this claim. I know it and I regret it; but I will take this occasion to say that in my humble judgment if there was one single, palpable, obvious duty that the Republican party owed to themselves, owed to the country, owed to humanity, owed to God when they came into power, it was to drive a plowshare from turret to foundation stone of the Supreme Court of the United States. They should have done it.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HALE. I cannot give way now. I am not pleased with that fashion. I intend no discourtesy; but I do not often speak to the Senate, and when I do speak I prefer to speak and not to have a dialogue.

Mr. DAVIS. I agree with you in that.

Mr. HALE. I am glad you do.

I repeat, Mr. President, that the first and most obvious duty that the Republican party owed to the country was to overturn that whole concern. If that court had been what the fathers of the Constitution intended it to be, we never should have been where we are now. If Chief Justice Taney could have remembered that he was a lawyer and not a politician he would have had an influence that would have prevented that monstrous perversion of law and justice and the Constitution which he pronounced in the Dred Scott case, and which he illustrated by the remark that this people had been considered as having no rights that white men were ever bound to respect.

But, sir, in that time, in that hour, in that opportunity such as God rarely gives to a people or a party, we utterly failed. There was an opportunity to place some of our own friends on the bench, and we were so anxious to place them there, as we had been shut out so long, that we failed in that most obvious duty, and the President nominated to us a number of gentlemen for seats on that bench. I voted when I was in the Senate (for I believe one of them was passed upon when I was not present) against the confirmation of every one of them, not because I had the slightest objection to them as individuals or as lawyers, but because I was averse to the policy of undertaking to build up and patch up that rotten concern. I thought there was a clear warrant in the Constitution of the United States for changing the court. The Constitution provided that the supreme judicial power should be vested in a Supreme Court and such other inferior courts as Congress might from time to time establish, clearly indicating that they might establish a Supreme Court and inferior courts, and if either of them failed in carrying out the purposes which Congress had in view, they might from time to time establish another.

But, sir, the opportunity to place some of our own friends on the bench was too tempting; these gentlemen had friends, and they were nominated, and in our hurry we confirmed them. I do not know personally all those gentlemen. I take this occasion to say of those whose acquaintance I have made that I have been highly gratified with them. I believe some of them at least, those I know, were put on the bench because they were lawyers; and I know the policy that prevailed before this Administration came into power was to put men there not because they were lawyers, but because they were not lawyers, and in all human probability never could be and certainly never would be.

But, sir, in the justice of God, which is sometimes swifter than we think, we got a little retribution there, for one of the first acts of these new judges that you were in such a hurry to place on the bench of the Supreme Court was to decide that we were not at war. Yes, sir, that is a judicial decision; that we are not at war; but it is something else; a riot, or something of that sort; and the provisions of the Constitution applicable to the case of war were decided not to be applicable to our present condition.

Well, sir, the time to change that court has gone by, never to return again. When the old man of the sea mounted on the shoulders of Sinbad the sailor, I believe the book—it is some time since I read it—records that every opportunity he got he made an attempt to throw him off, but he could not, and the old man stuck there and worried the sailor for a long time. Sir, when we had an opportunity to throw off this old man of the sea after it had fastened itself upon this Republic, and had fastened upon the country some of the most odious and damnable doctrines that disgrace our history, we failed to improve it, and we have now got to hug it just as long as we exist; and God only knows how long that will be. I hope for some time to come.

Now, sir, I will address myself more particularly to the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I make these remarks general in their application to everybody that gets up here and tells me that property can be held in slaves, and quotes these old decisions. My reason to them is, that the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commands all men everywhere to repent.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in the commencement of his speech, dwelt in sad retrospects as he contemplated the past history of our country and mourned over those days that he feared had departed forever. Though that was eloquent, it was not original; and it has been the lot—

Mr. DAVIS. Can you tell me anything that is original?

Mr. HALE. Yes; your mode of discussing the question for two or three days past was original. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Your mode of preaching here is original too.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, he lamented those days of the past that had gone, he feared, never to return. Let me read his words; I do not want to do him injustice:

"It seems to me that the decline of the great Republic has commenced in its early immaturity, and has progressed and is progressing with a rapidity beyond all precedent. I never indulged the dream that it could be immortal, perpetual; but I clung to the faith that it would have its periods of active youth, of vigorous manhood, and sound old age; and that each period would be measured by centuries."

The Senator from Kentucky seems always to mourn over the past, and lament the degeneracy of the present, and give way to gloomy thoughts at the prospects of the future. It is nothing new to the Senator from Kentucky. Let me tell the honorable Senator he entirely mistakes the day and the hour in which he lives, the contest in which the country is engaged, the condition of the country, and the traits of character which she has exhibited. In my humble judgment, when this war is over, as over it will be when the impartial pen of history shall write these events, and posterity shall dwell upon the record which we are this day making, this day, this hour, and this emergency over which the Senator from Kentucky laments so much will be set down as the golden day of the Republic, as the day when she displayed such traits of heroism, of real self-devoted patriotism, of self-forgetting and manly sacrifice of everything for the good of country, as was never before witnessed in the history of this nation or any other.

Sir, there have been instances, not a few nor confined to any particular section of the country, that do honor to human nature. The young and the gifted, occupying high social positions, turning their backs upon all the allurements of wealth, the endearments of the domestic circle, the invitations of ambition, and all that men most deem worth living for, have gone out with a heroism, with a devotion, with a piety such as the world never saw before, and devoted themselves willingly with their hearts' blood upon the altar of their country's salvation. And let me tell that Senator this shall not be lost. In the economy of God, such sacrifices as these never are lost. No, sir; every generous and noble sacrifice that has thus been made upon the altar of our country shall tell in the future condition of our country for ages to come. They shall never be lost.

Again, sir, the Senator complains that the President and that the party in power have changed their purposes. I do not stand here to say that it is not so; but let me tell the Senator and the country that is the law of every revolution, of every such contest. How was it in the American Revolution? What did our fathers start for? For revolution and for severance from their dependence upon the British Crown? No such thing. They sought constitutional liberty, and they repelled the idea that they were governed by a desire for independence or for separation from the British Crown as a foul libel upon their motives. They sought constitutional liberty under the protection of the British constitution. They desired that; but when they could not get it they were driven by the force of circumstances into opposition to the British Crown, and they took separation, not because they sought it originally, not because they desired it, but because it was impossible to attain the great end they had in view without taking it, and they took it as an alternative that they had no idea in the beginning of being pressed to.

Such has been the history of all revolutions. Men begin on a certain course of conduct, but events throw themselves in their way and they are molded and carried along by the course of these events. The part of true wisdom is for statesmen to conform themselves to the existing condition of things. I have no doubt that when the rebellion commenced, Mr. Lincoln and the Republican party and all those that undertook to defend the country and preserve and maintain its life were sincere, honest, and earnest in their professions to leave existing things as they found them. But, sir, they could not do it. They found as the war progressed that slavery was the giant that stood in their way. They saw that slavery obstructed their efforts to preserve, maintain, and defend the nation's life, and they said, "If that is the alternative and it comes to this, that slavery or the nation must die, let slavery die." This is all they have said. That is all they probably intended or thought of; and in saying that, they have said what they must have said or else have given up the contest. That is everything which can be said of Mr. Lincoln and the party that cooperates with him. They have simply conformed themselves in this gigantic struggle to the state of things which they found existing around them.

But, sir, the Senator, not content with that, goes on to make another charge. He says that the party in power have formed a most successful scheme for the overthrow of the liberties of their country. He does not state it as an incident of their policy, but as the intent. It is hardly necessary to spend much time on that; but if it be not denied it may be reiterated and repeated so often that it may go out for true. I deny it utterly.

There is another remark of the Senator to which I desire to call particular attention. It is this:

"I have never feared nor have I now the least apprehension of the permanent overthrow of free institutions anywhere in the United States by Jefferson Davis and his government; but I am beset by the gloomiest apprehensions that if Mr. Lincoln is re-elected, or some other man having his principles, policy, and scheme of government should be his successor, they will perish by him and his government, or by stronger men who will rise up and thrust them from their places."

Sir, that is nothing new. You may read the resolutions of the party in opposition to the present party in power during the canvasses of the elections that have taken place in the last year, and you may begin with the State of Maine and follow them up and go just as far as you find them, in Ohio and in every State in the Union where they organized, and you will find that is just exactly the tenor of their resolutions. They had not a word of condemnation or of reproach or of censure or of reproof for the rebels or the rebellion. They did not even recognize the existence of the rebellion. I remember, sir, a leading Democratic journal in the State of Maine was put into my hand, and it had in it a programme of what the Democratic party of the State of Maine intended to do if they were restored to power. I think there were eleven distinct propositions, and every solitary one of them looked to hampering and harassing their own Government, not a solitary one in regard to the rebellion. They had denunciations in abundance for Mr. Lincoln, not one for Jeff. Davis. They were on the same key-note with the speech of the Senator from Kentucky without exception. Read the resolutions of that party for the past year to a stranger knowing nothing of the history of the country except what he can get from their resolutions, and he would inevitably come to the conclusion that it was Mr. Lincoln and his friends that took Fort Sumter. The idea that it was their friends or that the secessionists had anything to do with it never would present itself. They would inevitably come to the conclusion that it was Mr. Lincoln who had sent war and desolation and bloodshed over the land, and that it was the duty of patriots and patriotism not to move a hand to oppose the rebellion, but to lend all their energies and agencies to the putting down of Mr. Lincoln and his Administration.

That has been the tenor of certain party papers in this country from the beginning. They had all their sympathies with rebels and the rebellion. All their denunciation and condemnation and reproof and reproach have been heaped upon the head of Mr. Lincoln. Sir, I am no glorifier of Mr. Lincoln or anybody else. I stand here a free man and a free Senator, ready to do justice to everybody; but I will say of Mr. Lincoln, let him have committed whatever mistakes he may—and I think he has committed some—I believe that a man more honest and a more patriotic man never was in power in this or any other country. That he has sometimes had men around him who were not up entirely to his own standard I believe; and that is one of Mr. Lincoln's weaknesses. He gets sometimes bad men around him, sometimes pretty near to him, and it requires a very great effort for a man of his good nature and pure purpose to get nerve enough to cut them off and drop them and let them go. I believe it would have been the part of policy, of a wise policy, of a patriotic, sagacious statesmanship, when he came into power to make a pretty clean sweep of those gentlemen that had been sitting and roosting in those Departments here for generations. I believe the country would have been vastly better for it. He did not exactly think so, and he has not thought so yet.

But, sir, of his purity, of his patriotism, of his sincere and earnest and honest and zealous desire to bring this war to a speedy and an honorable end, I do not believe there is one man in a million in the free States that has the slightest doubt in the world. It is a good deal in this country to get a man of whom that may be said; and especially when we reflect what kind of men at other times have ruled over the destinies of some other countries, to say nothing of our own, I think it is a very great point gained to have in the chair of State a man of such purity of character and such singleness of purpose. The idea that there should be in his character what the Senator from Kentucky says, the williness and the cowardice of the serpent, I think will fill the country with an abhorrence equal to that with which it would have been filled if he had accused him of any of the most odious crimes that could be committed. The assigning of the character of the greatest felon in a penitentiary in this land to the President would not have created a greater shock in the minds of the public than have the accusations which have been made against him in the speech of the Senator from Kentucky to which I have alluded.

Mr. President, I fear that I am repeating what I have said before. I fear we do not appreciate even yet the tremendous issues which are involved in the contest in which we are now engaged. I believe myself it is the contest of ages. I believe that the effects of all past history are culminating to their consequences in the result of the experiment that we are now making. I believe that we are settling the question of free government for ourselves, for posterity, and for all time; and though it costs us much, very much, much treasure and much blood, I believe that the end we shall reach and attain to will more than compensate us for it all. I believe that those who mourn, as no others do, for the loved and the lost, those who see vacant seats around the domestic board, those who have been called to sacrifice the joy and the pride of their hearts, when the compensation we are contending for shall be obtained, even they will rejoice at the price that Providence permitted them to pay for the great boon that will come to this nation.

Sir, let us not despair. It is a doctrine of revelation, and it is a doctrine of human experience, true in all conditions, that without the shedding of blood there is no remission, that great blessings do not come to us without strife and contest and blood. If it was a part of the divine economy that the great boon of Christian civilization could not be attained for the race without the shedding of the precious blood of the Son of God, let us not arraign Providence if He vouchsafes to us national salvation at the price of the blood of our dearest and best friends.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss any of the interesting constitutional questions that have been raised here, nor do I propose to go into a general discussion of the subject of slavery and emancipation. I rise simply to state to the Senate the condition in which I understand this question to be, and to give the reason for my own action.

The draft is to take place on the 10th day of March, and we are now in the 19th day of February. It is exceedingly important that this bill should be passed in season to be carried into operation before that time, if it is to be passed at all. We have but a very few days to do it; and I understand the House of Representatives has already voted to adjourn over until Tuesday, and nailed themselves on that subject, and are waiting to receive this bill to act upon it as soon as possible. It is in a peculiar stage. It has got to the point where we cannot amend it. This is the report of a committee of conference, and we must take it as a whole or not take it at all. All the discussions upon this and that particular provision of the bill are only to satisfy us that we should vote against it entirely, because there is no hope of amending it in any way.

Now, let me appeal to my friends on this side of the Chamber in a very few words, and I hope I shall not be considered as "a dictator" in attempting to do it. We understand that on the other side of the Chamber, with a certain portion of them, to say the least, it is made a party question somewhat; and it is opposed on that ground. The desire is to defeat any law providing for the conscription or amendatory of the law in existence. I find no fault with those gentlemen for taking that position; they have the right to take it. But let me ask gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, is it wise that we should protract this measure, which is so very important, (because I believe we are all agreed that we need an amendment of the existing law,) by long debates on points which cannot now be amended, unless our design is to defeat the bill by the arguments on these particular points; and more especially let me ask whether it is wise to take this occasion to reply to speeches made on another question and on another occasion in relation to other matters which are not pressing before the Senate, when we are in such a position as we are in with reference to this bill. The interests of the country, in our judgment on this side of the House, require not only that a bill on this subject should be passed, but that it should be passed at once in order to be effective; and gentlemen must see that if this bill fails we can have none in season for the effect that we wish to accomplish by it, that is, in season for the draft which is ordered.

I have not examined this report of the conference committee particularly. I have been so exceedingly engaged in other matters that I have had no time to examine it. I concurred with the majority in passing the original bill that went from the Senate. I understand that the report of the committee leaves the bill substantially the same, altering it in two or three particulars, which have been discussed here. With reference to some of those particulars, I might agree with my friends who have taken exception on the subject. There is one provision, which has not been specially alluded to that I know of, which I am very sorry has been struck out of the bill. I deemed it a very important provision, and was strongly in favor of it. That was the clause as to the appropriation of the commutation money; and substitutes were directed to be so procured that the respective districts might have the advantage, if they could, of the money they had paid. I understand that has been struck out. I would rather it had been retained. I think it would have been more just and more equal.

With regard to the particular proposition that is now under debate, I wish it to be understood that by any vote I may give for accepting the report of the committee I certainly do not mean to commit myself on any general principle. It often happens that in order to accomplish a great and good purpose in this particular crisis of our history we are obliged to take some things that we do not like. I am precisely in that position here. There are some things in the bill as it is left by this report that I do not like, that I would not vote for by themselves; but believing that the bill itself is very important, believing that time too is all-important, I hope we shall at once act upon it; and if my honorable friend from Kentucky has any design to respond to the speech which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has made in reply to one he made the other day, I will appeal to his magnanimity to defer it to some future occasion.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not any idea of replying.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not break my own rule and make a speech on the subject. I rose simply to appeal to our friends under the peculiar circumstances of the case to act on this question and let us settle whether we are to have the bill or not, and not longer discuss points which we cannot amend.

Mr. CARLILE. I shall detain the Senate but for a moment; and I do not know that I should occupy even a moment but for a remark which fell from the Senator from Maine. The Senator has intimated that probably party considerations will govern Senators in their votes on this bill. Mr. President, if I know myself, no such considerations have governed me in any vote I have cast since I have been a member of the Senate. I have patiently listened to the discussion to-day on this bill and upon the former act during this session and at the last Congress; and everything has been discussed, (if I may be allowed with all respect to say so,) in my humble judgment, but the very question in controversy. It is a misfortune, it may be the result of the troubled state of the times into which we have been thrown, that there is scarcely a proposition which comes before this body but what, in the opinions of Senators, the subject of slavery and the negro enters into its consideration, and upon such subjects almost all of the time of the Senate is expended by way of discussion.

Now, sir, I am free to say that if the Congress of the United States possesses the power to conscript white men it possesses the power to conscript negroes, whether free or slave; and upon that subject I would not hesitate for a moment. Convince me of the power, and I will go with the Senator from Michigan. When I heard the Senator from Michigan say that there could be no doubt of our power to conscript, I hoped he would attempt to prove it. Convince me of that power, and I will go with the Senator and vote for this proposition, but the bill itself assumes the power in the Government of the United States to conscript; and the discussions have all gone on the assumption of that power. Sir, I deny the power.

I not only doubt the power, but I deny the power to conscript either white or black men under the Constitution of the United States for any purpose whatever. I acknowledge your power to raise armies; but how are you to raise them? Is the Constitution to be so construed as to give to one clause efficacy by annulling another? Ought it not be construed so as to make it consistent with itself? Can you not give effect and force to every provision contained in it? If this Government possesses the power to conscript the citizens of the several States into its armies, I ask Senators where is that which is declared to be the only security of a free State, the militia of the State? Where is it but placed at the mercy of this Government? Your Constitution in as plain language as that which confers upon you the power to raise armies, recognizes the existence of the militia of the several States of the Union, and declares that that militia is the only security and protection to a free State, and prohibits you from taking away from it the right to bear arms. If you have the power, therefore, to conscript, it is an unlimited power, and you can destroy the militia of every State, and you can bring every State prostrate and bleeding at the feet of this Government. It is because I deny the power, because no argument has been attempted that I ever heard yet to show that the power to conscript exists in this Government, that I shall be compelled, under the oath I have taken to support the Constitution, to vote against this proposition.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Iowa a little while ago attempted to reply to the position I had taken, that the twenty-sixth section of the bill now before the Senate was a violation of the Constitution. He stated that the fixing of the value—

Mr. GRIMES. I take back all I said, if that will be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. POWELL. And admit that you were wrong?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. Then of course you will vote with me, unless you admit that you vote to violate the Constitution. If you admit that I am right, that this section is unconstitutional, I will say no more. But, sir—

Several SENATORS. Then let us vote now.

Mr. POWELL. If you insult me in that way

I will speak for five hours. I am not in the habit of speaking long in this body. I treat others like gentlemen, and I intend that they shall treat me so. I wish that to be distinctly understood. I have listened to a great many speeches here that were not very pleasant, and which I thought were not calculated to enlighten the Senate or the country, but I never was guilty of the rudeness of proposing to take a vote when a Senator had the floor; and no gentleman will do it.

Mr. President, I have but a very few remarks to make. The Senator from Iowa, when I cited the clause of the Constitution which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation as being violated by this bill, declared that the clause of the bill allowing the Secretary of War, on the report of a commission, to fix a value not exceeding $300 for the slave taken for the military service, was a compliance with the provision of the Constitution. The Senator by that argument admitted that the provision of the Constitution required compensation to be given. I hold that that provision in the bill is not a compliance with the clause of the Constitution which I cited. I think the Senator is utterly and totally mistaken when he says that Congress complies with that provision of the Constitution by fixing the value of the property taken by the Government. That provision of the Constitution cannot be fairly met or complied with unless the private property which is taken shall be paid for, a just compensation made, and that just compensation must be a fair and full equivalent for the value of the property taken.

Now, sir, in this bill you provide that the owner of the slave when he volunteers shall be paid a just compensation, but that that just compensation shall not exceed $300. I put it to the Senate if that is a just compensation within the meaning of the Constitution? It certainly is not. A just compensation undoubtedly means a fair equivalent. But there is a provision in the bill that when the slave is drafted the master shall only receive the $100 bounty. If the slave volunteers, he receives $300. I ask the Senate if the slave that volunteers is of more value than the slave who is drafted? Certainly not. Anybody that knows anything about slave property, knows that the slave who is attached to his home, and does not want to leave his master, other things being equal, is of more value than one that will volunteer; and yet, sir, if the slave is drafted under this bill in which you use the term "just compensation," the master gets but $100, while if the slave volunteers the master gets $300.

To tell me that such a provision meets the requirements of the Constitution is mockery, worse than mockery. Here are two slaves of equal age, equal in physique, equal in capacity to labor. One is willing to go away from his master and volunteer, and the other does not want to go, but you draft him; you propose to give the master of one $300 and the master of the other $100. I ask Senators, if they respect their oaths, how they can, in accordance with this provision of the Constitution, vote for this bill? It is clearly unconstitutional.

It will not do for Senators to say that there is no property in slaves. In this very bill you recognize that property and propose to make payment for it, but, as I believe, a very inadequate payment. I say you cannot meet the requirements of this provision of the Constitution unless you appoint some tribunal that is to fix the value of the property upon proof. That is the only way in which you can do it. Suppose we were to pass a bill saying that the horses in the State of Iowa should be taken into the public service, and that the Secretary of War should appoint a commission who should go to the State of Iowa and fix the value in order to pay the owners a just compensation, but should pay for no horse a sum exceeding twenty dollars, would the Senator from Iowa think that was a fulfillment of that clause of the Constitution? Certainly not, sir, if the horses be worth three or four or five times that amount, as some of them no doubt are. It is a clear, palpable, unmistakable violation of the Constitution. There can be no doubt about it.

Sir, when the legislature passes laws by which private property is taken for public uses, it must fix some tribunal that is to decide upon the question of value in which the parties can be heard, and a fair, just equivalent can be given. That is the meaning of the Constitution, and it cannot be tortured into meaning anything else. That has been the practice in all the States. If you take lands over which you make a road you have an inquisition from your courts, you go through the instrumentality of a jury generally and settle the value. It is so if you take any property for public uses in all the States of the Union. There is always some tribunal appointed to adjudge and to fix the value upon proof.

A man may have a slave worth $1,000, and if you draft that slave under this bill you propose to pay him but $100. He may have another slave worth $350, and if that slave enlists voluntarily in the Army you propose to pay him $300. That is a beautiful carrying out of the provision of the Constitution indeed! In the case of the drafted man you not only take the slave against his will, but in five cases out of ten you take him against the will of his master. Here you run counter both to the will of the slave who is drafted and to the will of the owner, and you attempt to get rid of this plain provision of the Constitution by allowing him $100 for property worth $1,000! The proposition is too plain for argument. I do not see how Senators who regard the Constitution as I construe it can cast a vote for this bill.

I will say one word to my friend from Michigan, and I shall not trouble myself particularly with authorities on this subject. The Senator holds that the common law did not recognize property in slaves. The Senator from Maryland to be sure has met that argument. I was astonished when the Senator from Michigan made that statement, knowing as I do his ability as a lawyer. Why, sir, it has been held by the highest tribunals in England over and over again that slaves were the subject of merchandise and property, and it has been so held by every State in Christendom.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me a word?

Mr. POWELL. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. Can he point out a single case of a commercial transaction where a slave formed a consideration of the contract in England or in any other place where the common law of England prevailed and which contract was upheld by the English courts? If he can do so he can do something towards convincing me of my error; or any case in modern times in which the English courts have recognized the legality of slavery within the limits of England, or any place where the common law of England prevailed.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me I will read an extract from the decision of the judges, delivered in 1713, when that question was submitted to them by the Crown in council:

"In pursuance of his Majesty's order in council, hereto annexed, we do humbly certify our opinion to be that negroes are merchandise."

That was signed by Lord Chief Justice Holt, Judge Pollexfen, and eight other judges of England.

Mr. HOWARD. Negroes?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. In England?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir. Does not the gentleman know that negroes were bought and sold in the streets of London for years? Such is the fact. In 1827, Lord Stowell, in the case commonly called the "Slave Grace" case by the lawyers, delivered a most elaborate opinion, in which he utterly repudiated the opinion of Lord Mansfield in the Somerset case, and held the doctrine that slaves were subjects of merchandise protected by the laws.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky what was the nature of the transaction to which that case referred?

Mr. POWELL. That was the case of a slave brought from the Bermudas. I do not recollect the particulars minutely.

Mr. HOWARD. In what way did it arise in the courts? Was it on a habeas corpus, or was it for the collection of some debt growing out of the sale of a slave? What was the nature of the transaction?

Mr. POWELL. I cannot state the whole facts of the case. I have not got it before me; but I will give the Senator another case. In the high court of admiralty Sir William Scott pronounced an opinion in the case of the Le Louis in 2 Dodson's Reports, in which he said:

"Let me not be misunderstood or misrepresented as a professed apologist for this practice when I state facts which no man can deny, that personal slavery arising out of forcible captivity is coeval with the earliest periods of the history of mankind; that it is found existing—and, as far as appears, without diminution—in the earliest and most authentic records of the human race; that it is recognized by the codes of the most polished nations of antiquity; that under the light of Christianity itself, the possession of persons so acquired has been in every civilized country invested with the character of property, and secured as such by all the protections of law; that solemn treaties have been framed and national monopolies eagerly sought to facilitate and extend the commerce in this asserted property; and all this, with all the sanctions of law, public and municipal, and without any opposition, except the protests of a few private moralists, little heard and less attended to, in every country, till within these very few years, in this particular country. If the matter rested here, I fear it would have been deemed a most extravagant assumption in any court of the law of nations to pronounce that this practice, the tolerated, the approved, the encouraged object of law, ever since man became subject to law, was prohibited by that law, and was legally criminal. But the matter does not rest here."

Sir William Scott in that case decides clearly that slavery was recognized by the law of nations; and I will tell the Senator that at the time the Constitution of the United States was formed, under the law of nations slavery was recognized in every country in Christendom. There can be no doubt of that. Whether that holding be right or wrong, such was the holding of the courts. It was decided so by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the Antelope. It was decided so by Judge Parker, of Massachusetts, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Griffith. It was so held in both of our treaties in 1783 and in 1815 with Great Britain, which treaties recognized property in slaves. I think my friend from Michigan was entirely and utterly mistaken in his legal view of the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the vote is taken I will state that I have received a note from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] stating that he is at his lodgings sick.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Newmirth, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Connors, Davis, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.
